Mr. CONKLING. I venture to make one suggestion here to the committee. Perhaps I ought to have said before, at any rate now that I think of it I take care to say, that I beg the Senators having this bill in charge to understand that I am not seeking to find fault with the bill. Indeed most of the things to which I have called attention I believe were in the House bill and would not be chargeable upon the committee of this body. Be that as it may, I make these suggestions and I refrain from offering amendment because I think if any changes are worth while, they can be made more wisely and appropriately by members of the committee. My purpose is merely to call attention as we pass along to some of these things.

At this point the Chair was about to state that there being no objection the amendment which occurs in line 13 would be considered agreed to. What is that amendment? It is to strike out the words "by a joint or several actions," and make it read "by an action in the name of the United States in any district court of the United States."

I stop there to observe, that here are a number of men in collusion committing the crime of smuggling. Mere information comes to the prosecuting officer, and he commences a suit or takes a proceeding against one or some or all of those really guilty. That proceeding goes to judgment, and then, as I understand this amendment, the Government is forever barred and estopped. If it has sued the wrong man, if there is an improper joinder, if for any reason whatever the Government is defeated in the action, that one action bars all remedy, no matter how flagrant or how palpable upon after discovery the case may be.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say a word to the Senator from New York in regard to this bill that he may see exactly the condition in which it is placed and the reason why I have not deemed it my duty to reply more distinctly to the points of objection that he makes against the bill.

In the first place, this bill has been very maturely considered in the House of Representatives, it having been the chief work of one of the committees of that body, considered in connection with the Treasury Department. It was debated for some days in the House of Representatives. It came to this body and was referred to the Committee on Finance. In some respects the subject-matter of the bill probably might be referred to that committee and in some respects it might be referred to the Committee on Commerce. I have no doubt the Committee on Commerce are more familiar with the details of invoices and the modes and operations of commercial matters. But it was referred to our committee, and we thereupon referred it to a sub-committee and sent it to the Department, invoking the most careful criticism of it in detail, especially as to the working operations of the bill. The sections recently read by the Senator are sections which relate simply to the formal working of the machinery of the bill, the passing of invoices, the making of affidavits, formal papers, who should take the oath, who should sign the papers, &c. To those sections the especial attention of the proper Department was called; and I have in my hand a statement from the Department, signed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and also from the officer in charge of the customs revenue, going in detail over these sections.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator can he lay his hand on the remark made by the Department on this section and the remedy given here, one action in the name of the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. No objection is made to that section by the Secretary of the Treasury. The amendment to strike out the words "a joint or several actions" is an amendment of the Committee on Finance. I do not see in this statement any recommendation of that amendment, although I thought there was. The sections are numbered in this statement in their order. Yes; I think that very amendment is mentioned.

Mr. CONKLING. It is section 10 in the House bill, section 12 in your print.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see any criticism in regard to that, the substitution of one action for a joint or several actions.

Mr. CONKLING. Nothing about section 12 at all?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; I think not. It speaks about section 12, but I think it means section 13, the next section. This formal criticism together with a mass of documents and letters in regard to the various sections and provisions of this bill all come from the Treasury Department. Besides that, this bill was submitted to many custom-house officers familiar with the ordinary course of business. I myself called the attention of several persons, by letter, to the bill and the details of the bill, persons in the city of New York for instance, and the bill itself has been submitted to the scrutiny of merchants in New York who have been here advocating or opposing various amendments to the bill; so that so far as the general examination of the bill is concerned, the scrutiny of the bill, it would be impossible to give it a greater scrutiny. I am only sorry now that I am not more familiar with the actual details of the ordinary routine operations in the custom-house, so that I could meet and perhaps answer the objections made by the Senator from New York; but I rely in these matters very much indeed upon the opinion of the gentleman who was Secretary of the Treasury and also upon the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] who has himself been an actual administrator of a custom-house.

Having made these remarks, the Senator from New York will excuse me from attempting to answer the objections made to these formal sections in regard to the administration of the custom-house; for instance, his comments upon the tenth section. The custom-house broker or agent makes the oath now, as I understand it.

Mr. CONKLING. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think so. I know I have imported goods through New York, and I never took a custom-house oath in my life, but somebody did it for me; and I suppose, as a matter of course, the consignee of the goods to whom they were sent made the oath.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly, the consignee did.

Mr. SHERMAN. The consignee is an agent in one sense of the word.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me, I do not wish to interrupt him, but the point of my criticism is this: Under the law as it now stands, not only the consignee of the goods and the owner may be resorted to, but the books and papers within his power may be required.

Mr. SHERMAN. This gives that.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me, this does not give that. On the contrary, this bill expressly is satisfied with whatever the agent himself may know and by the production of any invoice or paper within his power. That is the very point of my criticism, that the change which this makes now is to substitute the knowledge of the broker, who may know nothing about it whatever, for the knowledge of the person to whom the law now points, who must from necessity know all about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I again go back and say if there was any defect of that kind in the machinery of this bill, certainly those officers who are most interested in preventing any evasions of the revenue to whom the bill has been submitted and who have examined it under our instructions with the utmost care for any defects, would have reported it. But if the Senator from New York thinks this bill is in any respect defective so as to open the revenue to any frauds or evasions, and he will suggest such amendments as will prevent them, I certainly will listen to them with great attention, and shall feel disposed to agree to any reasonable amendment that he may offer. If upon his own experience or any information he can get he can point out amendments to this bill which he thinks will strengthen it, I shall be very glad indeed to have him do so, and I will listen with attention to any amendments that he may offer.

As to the particular amendment now pending, whether or not the action should be recovered for a single penalty, this provides for a single penalty. The section provides that if a person fails to do a certain thing, or neglects to do it, or fails to produce copies of papers, &c., he shall specially forfeit and pay a fine of not more than $5,000 for each offense, to be recovered as the House have provided, by a joint or several action in any circuit or district court of the United States. The Committee on Finance thought that for a single offense there ought to be an action in the name of the United States. If there can be two actions for the same penalty, then it may be better to have it read "joint or several actions," as the House have it. My friend from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] shakes his head, so that I take it we have made a wise amendment. It seemed to us that an action in the name of the United States, without saying whether it should be joint or several, would be sufficient to cover all proper remedies for the penalty.

Mr. CONKLING. In reply to the Senator from Ohio I wish to make one or two observations. The Senator speaks of custom-house officers having advised in regard to this bill. I wish to say one word in respect of the officers of customs at the port of New York. They being interested pecuniarily in parts of this bill have been perhaps properly, at all events totally abstinent, so far as I know, of all suggestions and all efforts in regard to it. If they have been applied to for information, I doubt not they have responded; but I feel quite sure from what I know that their intention has been to abstain absolutely from all interference with this bill, and that I will say of those officers, and markedly in respect of the collector, is in accordance with the very high character which he deserves not only for integrity but for manhood in all regards. The last part of his design has been, I am quite sure, to do anything whatever which would lead it to be even suspected that he was attempting to interpose his private interests against the public good.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from New York will allow me, I desire to add to what I stated that I did not apply to the collector of the port of New York or to the officers there, because upon inquiry of the Senator from New York for the name and address of those gentlemen he suggested himself that probably they would be disinclined to object to a bill that undoubtedly affected their compensation largely. I thought it was a proper suggestion, and did not make any application to those gentlemen; and I can say of those custom-house officers, although their interests are deeply involved by the passage of this bill, by the repeal of moieties, no one of them has ever approached us in regard to any objections to it. We have looked at it simply in the light of the public service. I say that in their behalf. Not one of them sought to obstruct the passage of this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I am very glad to hear the Senator from Ohio say that. His statement will be borne out I think by the statement of every member on this floor who shall make any statement in regard to it. These gentlemen have abstained absolutely from doing anything directly or indirectly, so far as I know, to influence this legislation, and especially to interpose anything in respect to their interests.

Turning to another remark of the Senator, I wish to say that district attorneys have written to me; and I do not refer to the district attorney for the southern district of New York alone by any means; but district attorneys in other districts have suggested to me by letter and personally some of the objections to which I have called attention of the Senator from Ohio and many other objections to which I have not called his attention. They have suggested to me objections to this very section which we are now considering, section 12, and with so much earnestness and that in respect of which they can have no personal interest, I take it, that I can hardly conceive that any lawyer familiar with the revenue laws and their execution has undertaken in reviewing this bill to pronounce favorably upon this section. But I simply make the statement now that some of these objections have been suggested to me by different law officers of the Government, although they have not come in any sense from the officers of customs interested in moieties.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, it seems to me that the criticism made by the Senator from New York upon the amendment in line 13 of section 12 is not well founded. The bill as sent to us from the House provides that any persons offending against this act shall severally forfeit and pay a fine of not more than $5,000 for each offense; and it seems that the bill also provided then that that fine or that penalty should be recovered by a joint or several action. The committee have amended it by striking out the words "a joint or several actions," and providing that it shall be recovered by "an action in the name of the United States," and the Senator from New York insists that the several penalties shall be recovered by a joint or several actions.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator must not say that. He must not put in my mouth a thing which would show such total ignorance as that. The Senator from New York insists, when you provide a penalty against various persons and provide that that penalty may be recovered in such action as is adapted to it, whether it be joint or several, that you may leave the pleader or the district attorney to draw his declaration; whereas when you say, speaking of a number of persons in severalty, that the penalty must be recovered in one action, even if the action would lie, upon which point I made no suggestion at all, you there run the risk if you fail in one action of being forever concluded, no matter what evidence may be discovered afterward on which you could recover against other of these persons. That was my suggestion.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I think the Senator is mistaken in the law.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not say that I am not, but I do not want the Senator to misquote what I say.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The section provides that any person who shall be guilty under this act shall forfeit a penalty of not more than $5,000 for each offense. Now under this amendment the actions are to be severally brought and severally tried. If one of the parties against whom such a prosecution is brought is found to be not guilty, I am not aware that that verdict can have any effect upon any subsequent prosecution against another person. I am unaware how any such a verdict can have any such effect. Each of these actions of prosecution being a separate prosecution is to stand upon its own merits, and the fact that in a former prosecution a verdict of acquittal was rendered in favor of somebody else cannot be used in any way, either as evidence or as matter of estoppel in a subsequent prosecution against somebody else. In my judgment, the amendment is correct and right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from New York to object to the amendment?

Mr. CONKLING, No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendment will be considered as adopted.

The next amendment was in section [10] 12, line 15, to strike out the words "as aforesaid;" and in lines 16, 17, and 18, to strike out the words "liable to forfeiture, which forfeiture shall apply only to the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud, or alleged fraud, relates," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "forfeited; which forfeiture shall only apply to the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged fraud relates and anything contained in any act which provides for the confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued be, and the same is hereby, repealed; so that the section will read:

SEC. [10] 12. That any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make, or attempt to make, any entry of imported merchandise, by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or who shall be guilty of any willful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by such act or omission, shall severally forfeit and pay a fine of not more than $5,000 for each offense, to be recovered by an action in the name of the United States, in any district or circuit court of the United States; and in addition to such fine as aforesaid, such merchandise shall be forfeited; which forfeiture shall only apply to the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged fraud relates; and anything contained in any act which provides for the confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. CHANDLER. This clause I think could not have been understood by the committee reporting it. It is evidently in the interest of smugglers, and certainly the Committee on Finance never intended to put in a clause expressly for their benefit. It is very well known that the great leak in our Treasury proceeds from undervaluation. For example, you take a cheap fabric and put in with it a much more expensive fabric, inventorying them all at the lower price. Now, this clause simply proposes to confiscate the article which is undervalued. The law as it now stands confiscates the whole, but you now propose to take simply the article undervalued and allow the rest of the invoice to go scot-free. Take, for example, silks from Belgium. In a case of silks a similar package to the case of silks will be put in with lace shawls. A single lace shawl is perhaps worth a whole case of silks. In such a case, if the fraud is detected, you say the silks are to go scot-free and you are to confiscate the lace shawl. The duty is, I think, 60 per cent., and if the importers lose every third invoice, they are making enormous profits upon the smuggling transactions; and yet you say to the smuggler, "Although you may have been successful three or four times; although you may have made 400 per cent. or 500 per cent. upon the risk, still you risk nothing but the article itself."

Now, Mr. President, I am sure, if there is a merchant within the sound of my voice, he understands this thing and the operation of it, and I am sure if there is a merchant upon this floor he will see that this should be entitled "An act to encourage smuggling." That certainly was not the intent of the Committee on Finance in reporting the bill.

I now move, if it is in order, and I believe it is, to strike out all after the word "forfeited" in the eighteenth line, allowing the amendments that have been made to remain. Mark you, Mr. President, as the law now stands the whole invoice is forfeited. This clause releases the whole invoice except the smuggled article. I want the whole invoice to be forfeited, and I want the $5,000 fine in addition. I want to protect the honest importer, and I would make it a state-prison offense in addition to the $5,000 fine upon the dishonest smuggler. I move to strike out in the eighteenth line after "forfeited" the rest of the section, in these words:

Which forfeiture shall only apply to the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged fraud relates; and anything contained in any act which provides for the confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I ask that that be stricken out, and I think that the Committee on Finance will agree with me after the explanation which I have given.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It has long been felt to be a very great hardship by the honest importers throughout the country that in case of an undervaluation so great that it shall be considered a fraud the entire invoice shall be forfeited. By this clause it is proposed to change the existing laws on this subject, and instead of forfeiting the entire invoice where the undervaluation or the fraud, constructive or otherwise, may be a very small and insignificant matter, it will not hereafter allow the forfeiture of the entire invoice. That was the subject of great complaint in the celebrated case of Phelps, Dodge & Co., where the whole amount of undervaluation was about $1,600 I believe, and yet the estimated forfeiture amounted to a million and a half or more. My impression is that the honest importers throughout the country have regarded this law as a very onerous provision, and if we retain this clause as it is, subjecting the parties to a fine of not more than $5,000 and to the forfeiture of any article that shall be undervalued so as to be considered a case of fraud, I think that will be amply sufficient to protect the revenue of the country.

Mr. BAYARD. In order that the Senate may realize the present condition of the law and the very great hardships upon honest merchants which are made possible, which are indeed the necessary result of continuing the present law, and to exhibit to the Senate the necessity for the pending amendment, I will refer to a case that was spoken of yesterday. Under the present law and its strict construction according to the views of Treasury special agents, collectors, and others who pass upon these cases, the house of Phelps, Dodge & Co., in New York, would have technically lost $1,750,000 for the undervaluation of a small class of their importations scattered through a series of invoices for five or six years, the whole value of which did not amount to $6,000, and the duty upon which was $1,600. Because, forsooth, a house that had been paying duties by tens of millions into the Treasury during that period of five years, by the undervaluation, innocent or otherwise, of a clerk, an agent, or some one connected with their great and multifarious business, have made an error of $300 in any one year, the whole fortune of that firm, the accumulation of their whole honest business lives, was to be swept away for that technical infraction of the revenue laws!

My friend [Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont] remarks to me that during the very period of five years in which there were undervaluations in this enormous business to the amount of $6,000, there were by the same firm overvaluations very far in excess of the amount of their undervaluations. The amount of duty which they paid to the Treasury on certain invoices over and above that which the law demanded from them during that same period of time was largely in excess of the undervaluation for which they were condemned; and yet under the technical application of the law they were compelled to pay the enormous sum of two hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator, is not that the precise sum which this amendment would fix?

Mr. BAYARD. No; the precise sum, as I understand, taken from these people would be $6,000, because it would have been the items in the invoices to be affected, not the invoices themselves.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me, he is quite in error as to the fact. That compromise was made, as all the papers show, by taking the total of tainted items so called, precisely that total which this amendment points out. There was no forfeiture of the invoices whatever, but only of the items in which the undervaluation had taken place.

Mr. BAYARD. I have here the statement of Mr. Dodge made under examination and cross-examination before a committee of the other House. I do not care, however, to raise a side issue or an issue perfectly immaterial as to the fact. My object was to speak correctly, and I think I have done so.

But if I succeed in showing to the Senate that the object of this bill is a wholesome, moderate, just amelioration of the present law, they will not hesitate, I think, to adopt the amendments both of the House of Representatives and of the Senate committee. The question is whether a single item in an invoice being undervalued shall taint the entire invoice. There is no protection to smuggling here. If the item be undervalued, two things follow: the condemnation of the item, and the punishment of the merchant for his attempting to undervalue at all. The penalty of $5,000 is not proportioned simply to the sum of which he is endeavoring to defraud the revenue. The penalty is for the crime per se. The question is, when the undervaluation has been made and the forfeiture takes place, whether it shall taint an entire invoice because of the error in regard to that single item.

Now, when you remember that this bill has been the result of long investigation by the committees of both Houses, that it is the result of very extended examination, of accumulated testimony from the best commercial sources, that it is in the strongest sense of the word a reform demanded by the facts made known to Congress during the past winter and by prior investigations of committees of Congress, I think there need be no hesitation in confining the condemnation of the items of an invoice to the undervalued items. It does not, as I say, affect the cumulative penalty, the fine, or the imprisonment that may come as the just punishment for smuggling. It simply restricts the forfeiture to what it reasonably should be restricted to; that is, it restricts the forfeiture to the single item which is tainted by the undervaluation and it does not affect the rest.

I can join with the Senator from Michigan in the very hearty denunciation of dishonest merchants and the necessity for their punishment. I said yesterday that if this abominable system of seizures and moieties, which the present measure is meant to do away with, had but been relaxed in a single case so that one dishonest merchant who had committed perjury and other infractions of law, as he must have done to obtain his goods at a lower rate of duty through the custom-house, had been landed where he ought to have been, in the penitentiary of the State of New York or elsewhere, where the crime was committed, you would have had a better lesson, a more effective prevention of smuggling than a thousand years of your system as conducted under the seizure and moiety law. What we want is a disinterested, upright, stern administration of penal law on this subject, and that public justice shall not be sold as it has been and glossed over in order to bring money into the hands of moiety-seekers and informers. It is well known that the practice is, when a settlement has once been made, when the merchant has once paid this sum, all penalties, all imprisonment, all punishment, all further disgrace are condoned. They are all merged in the money that passes into the pocket of the informer and the moiety-sharer.

This bill and this portion of the bill are alike necessary, and they are demanded at the present time in my belief by the experience of the workings of bad laws. I shall rejoice with the Senator from Michigan over the punishment of every infraction of the revenue law. I have, as he has, nothing but condemnation to award to men who will bring disgrace upon the reputation of American merchants; but we have abundant law for their punishment, and there is no necessity for this wholesale condemnation of property because a single item of an invoice has been undervalued.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is very well known that the law as it is leaves the remedy in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is the intent which is punished. I will not go into the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co.; but I will say that it is the most remarkable case on record, where there was no intent to defraud, where the parties were assured if there was no intent to defraud the penalty would be remitted, that a house should pay two hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars when there was only sixteen hundred dollars due. But I will not discuss that, for I know nothing about it.

But, Mr. President, the power is left purposely with the Secretary of the Treasury to remit any fines that may be imposed. It is well known that the receipts of the New York custom-house are perfectly enormous, and it is likewise well known that in several branches of traffic the American merchant has been driven from the field. He cannot compete in certain articles of German production. That has been so for the last quarter of a century; and why? On account of frauds in the custom-house, on account of undervaluations. These men go on day after day, and week after week, and month after month, and year after year, with their undervaluations and their false swearing; they roll up millions of dollars of profits by false swearing; and then after you have unearthed their rascality you say they simply suffer to the extent of the value of the article undervalued. Why, sir, this thing has been going on every year and every day of every year for years. They would take a case of cotton goods and put in a few pieces of other goods in the case. It is not the custom of the custom-house inspectors to go over the whole of an invoice or to examine the whole of a package. They examine the top, and in the middle are these very valuable goods, and this goes on for years; and when at last you detect the man in the intent to defraud your Treasury, you say he shall simply forfeit the article upon which he meant to cheat, and if there was no intent to defraud then there is no penalty, for you leave it in the hands of your chief executive officer to remit the penalty in every instance where there was no intent to defraud.

Mr. President, I hope this clause will be stricken out, and I should like to put an additional penalty upon that $5,000, of imprisonment in the State prison for five years for intent to defraud.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. OGLESBY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMLIN. I believe I am as desirous of co-operating with Senators here who seek to effect a remedy for existing evils in the revenue laws, and am as heartily disposed to accomplish that object as any member of this body; but I believe that in seeking a remedy for existing evils, it is very easy to do that which may be often worse than the one which we seek to correct.

I do not think there would be any difficulty in enlarging the powers of the Secretary, if there were any necessity for it, to relieve honest merchants beyond what he now has the power to do. If there be a necessity, that in my judgment is the remedy to be sought in cases where invoices have been made at a lower valuation than they should be, but without the knowledge or without the fraudulent intent of the shippers. There is not the slightest trouble in the world in extending the equitable powers of your Treasury Department if they need an extension, and to make them more ample than they now are to meet all such cases as have arisen and as have been alluded to in this debate.

But in seeking a remedy in another direction, you invite dishonesty in commercial transactions. If you allow this language to pass into a law, my word for it it will affect your revenue to the extent of millions of dollars every year. There can be no more doubt about it in my judgment than there is in the mathematical proposition that two and two make four.

My slight acquaintance with the administration of the law leads me to know that in commercial communities where merchants are of the highest tone they have to compete with another class of men who do not possess their character and their integrity, and we here to-day in this body owe a protection to the honest merchant, while we seek to inflict a penalty upon the dishonest. If you pass into a law the provision of this bill, you give a direct inducement for that class of men in your community who are brought into competition with the honest, the upright, and high-toned merchants, to make the attempt to get into the country in boxes, in packages, and in a variety of ways a half or a quarter of the portion of their invoice which is in value vastly beyond the amount of the remaining portion of the packages or boxes, and if you only hold that amount which is thus fraudulently undervalued, if you attach to the act no penalty beyond that, you certainly induce the man who is dishonest to make the attempt, because you inflict upon him a penalty less than he would suffer if the package or the box were wholly made up of articles of higher price with an undervaluation. There can be no doubt in my judgment that it is a direct inducement, an inducement that will make the honest merchant in New York and Boston and Baltimore suffer more than you can relieve the honest merchants by it.

I have not a doubt that that clause will diminish your revenues by millions. I do not know but that you might go one step further. I think there is inducement enough for smuggling now under this bill. Before you dispose of it you may give a little bounty to the man who shall commit fraudulent transactions upon your revenue; but it comes so near that now that I do not think it would be quite necessary to do that. It is changing your whole law. It is as easy as anything in the world can be to enlarge the equity powers of your Treasury Department if you want to do it. But, I repeat again, if this language remains in the bill, it will lead, in my judgment, to the very essential and very great injury of every honest merchant in the country and to the very large diminution of your revenue.

That is my judgment; and having those opinions, while you correct your existing evils, I want to vote for no provisions that will open up objections which will still be greater than those that now exist, evils greater than those which we are now seeking to remedy.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am very reluctant to disagree with the Senator from Maine on this subject, but it seems to me that the Senator goes upon the idea that all of the importers are rascals.

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not believe any such thing. And again, the Senator from Maine proposes to do away with this provision and then provide that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to remit all fines and forfeitures in these cases. Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that we had better have a moderate law and enforce it in every case rather than to have an extravagant one that never will be enforced in any case. I do believe that this amount of forfeiture with the fine and penalty is sufficient. I do not believe if we give the power to the Secretary of the Treasury to remit a fine in case the whole invoice was forfeited that it would be enforced in one case in fifty. Therefore, it seems to me altogether better that we should try this system. We know that it has been a subject of complaint for years and years that for the most trifling error as to valuation an entire invoice, sometimes amounting to half a million dollars, was subject to forfeiture. It does seem to me that the article about which any fraud has been committed should be the only article which should be tainted and confiscated. The bill proposes to do that and no more.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to this discussion, and I think I begin to see some light on this question. It looks to me as if the amendment which my friend from Michigan proposes is a reasonable one, and I shall give it my hearty support for the reasons that I propose to submit to the Senate.

The case put by this section, Mr. President, is not a case, as the Senator from Vermont supposes, of innocent undervaluation, of a simple error upon the part of the importer or the consignee, or their agent. It is not for innocent errors of this kind that these penalties are denounced—fine and confiscation—but it is for deliberate attempts to defraud the Government by false invoices, by perjury, that these penalties are to fall. Now, sir, between the penalty and the crime as it stands in this section there is no sort of proportion. What is the crime denounced here? It is against those persons who, with intent to defraud the revenue, make or attempt to make an entry of imported merchandise. How? "By means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal." What, then, is the penalty for attempting to make this entry of an entire invoice? Why, the committee say, simply a fine, which may be one dollar or five thousand dollars, in the discretion of the judge, and the confiscation of the particular article that shall thus have been fraudulently undervalued. Now, sir, my position is that the undervaluation, deliberately and falsely, of a single article taints the whole invoice, and the whole invoice should be forfeited for that. There is no kind of logical proportion whatever between the penalty which is denounced here and the crime which is described. No, sir; let the law stand as it has stood. It will never be enforced in the case that the honorable Senator from Vermont supposes—where there has been simply an error by carelessness. No, sir; there must be deliberate fraud, there must be perjury, in order to call down upon the importer or the consignee the penalty denounced by this section; and I say it is no penalty at all to let him off with simply the forfeiture of the particular article which has been largely undervalued.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, and I wish in few words to state my reasons. In the main they have been assigned by other Senators. I see one objection to which no reference has been made.

We have heard to-day something about the demand for reform. There is such a demand; but neither I nor any other Senator will win lasting satisfaction by so voting as to multiply crimes which I think the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] has justly characterized.

There are three parties at whose interest we shall look if we legislate wisely and boldly on this subject. First, there is the Government, entitled to its revenues levied by law; second, there is the honest importer, who pays one hundred cents in the dollar for every impost laid upon him; and third, there are the pirates, the poachers, the smugglers, the dishonest undersellers, who take what has come to be known as a custom-house oath, "kissing their thumb when they swear," as a distinguished barrister used often to say, and by fraud manage to whip the devil around the stump and pay duties enough less than those imposed by law and paid by their neighbors to enable them to undersell honest merchants in the market. I will observe the oath under which I am, by voting absolute justice to all these parties, whatever the din or the clamor here or there may be.

In the present instance it is proposed to vitiate a venerable rule of law, a rule which my honorable friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] misapprehended, when, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, he stated to the Senate some weeks ago that the law had always been that an invoice fraudulent was void only pro tanto and that an act which he procured to be passed sub silentio was intended only to declare a well-understood maxim of the law. The late Chief Justice of the United States in 1870 announced from the bench, having the authority of the whole Supreme Court, that the reverse was the law, that fraud vitiates the whole of a transaction if it vitiates it at all. If a paper be fraudulent it is void; not void in the line of the letter where the fraud resides, but void altogether because tainted with fraud, and the law hates fraud and will not tolerate it. Be it a bond, a mortgage, a note, an invoice, be it any instrument known to the law, if, as the Senator from Indiana says, perjury and fraud have entered into it, that black drop poisons it all, not an item merely. Now it is proposed to reverse this rule of law, and to say of an invoice that it shall be void only in so far as the particular words go in which the fraud is covered up.

The Senator from Michigan pointed us to some of the dangers. He might have gone further in his illustration. He took the case of a package of silks. Let me take the same illustration. A man importing silks or prints, a dozen packages of silk ostensibly alike, has in the midst of one or some of them vials of ottar of roses, diamonds, or laces. One need not be a merchant, as my honorable friend has been, to know that custom-house officers do not and cannot examine by the eye every box and every package or box, and the contents. On the contrary, they are compelled to sample this examination. If there are a dozen boxes they examine only one or two. But now says this provision to everybody, "Put your diamonds in the midst of your silks; put in ottar of roses; put in costly laces; if you are a bold gambler upon chances you can make immensely by so doing, and when you are caught," as the Senator from Indiana says, "you may be fined five dollars, or possibly five thousand, and you forfeit nothing but the particular article; and upon that article the duty is often more than the value of the article itself."

Mr. President, this would be somewhat extraordinary stopping here; the argument has been made before, however, and I will not dilate upon it. I rose to make another suggestion, and I commend it to the Senator from Michigan, living on the extreme frontier as he does and knowing as well as I do the force it should have. The amendment of the committee provides that only the item, mark it, in which the fraud occurs shall be forfeited. As to all importations from abroad—I will speak of the British provinces in a moment—inland transportation, boxing, commissions, and so on, are dutiable just as much as the fabric itself. Now a man imports an immense quantity of goods, as many as A. T. Stewart imports. He willfully omits from his invoice all commissions, all inland carriage and transportation, all boxing, all manner of charges applicable to the whole invoice alike, and you prove it as strong as proof from Holy Writ, is anything to be forfeited under this proposed section? Not a shilling; not a thread. Why? Because says this law you must carve out or put finger on the particular item in which the fraud exists, and forfeit that. Very well; all these frauds do not relate to any particular item. Then what are you going to do? Take cattle and lumber from Canada. A man buys a drove of horses or a drove of cattle in the interior. When he goes to make his entry, he omits all these items, all inland transportation, everything which the law requires to be added to the first price; he leaves them out altogether, or states it at a nominal amount. You catch him and prove his fraud upon him. What is to be forfeited? Which horse in this drove does it apply to? Which item in these many million feet of lumber does it apply to? Not to any, as I understand it. And yet the Senator from Vermont says it is a great hardship to leave the law as it is now. I say, Mr. President, that it is not, and I want to be sure before taking my seat to correct one impression which has appeared repeatedly in this debate.

The Senator from Vermont argues as if a mere mistake, a mere technical error, a blunder no matter how inadvertent, as the law stands, justifies judge or jury in forfeiting an entire invoice. I say no law upon the statute-book justifies in such a case the forfeiture of a farthing, and if any man, lawyer or layman, will show me, I will thank him for the case, reported or unreported, brought to him even by tradition or hearsay, in which any judge of the United States has ever charged a jury or allowed a jury to suppose that they could find a verdict forfeiting an invoice for fraud unless they found as matter of fact, not that a technical omission or error had taken place, but that fraud, that fraud which appears in the statute in the word "knowingly," had in truth been committed.

I have heard a great deal of the dangers that men respectable and otherwise felt exposed to. I have heard strange romances on this subject. I have taken pains to learn especially in the case of Judge Blatchford, who has presided in more of these trials than any other single judge, and I am assured by the district attorney, by counsel on all sides of these controversies, that it has never been insisted seriously and certainly never tolerated in that court or any other of which my informants have information that a verdict was to be found under existing statutes, upon the theory that a fraud upon the revenue had been committed unless it was proved to the satisfaction of the jury that fraud—and I vse the word with its full implications—had in truth and in fact been committed; if there is any case, more especially any instance in the State of New York in which a verdict has ever been found in one of these cases against a man technically guilty only, or without fraud being found by the jury as matter of fact, I shall thank some Senator to furnish me that case. I undertake to say that no such thing can be found; the present bill makes this absolutely certain in future, and, therefore, as the Senator from Indiana well says, the question is in case of the man who commits one of the most injurious, one of the most prevalent, one of the most hurtful crimes known—I mean the crime of perjury—whether he shall know before and after he ventures upon the crime that the penalty if he is caught is one sufficient in dollars and cents to deter most men from the risk, or whether, on the contrary, all men shall be told in advance that a doctrine of chances is held out to them against which they can weigh the quantum of sin and make it matter of pecuniary speculation and profit?

I will vote for everything in this bill calculated to give a fair trial to modes of collecting the revenue without resort to moieties and without the seizure of papers and books of which so much has been said. But do not let us, while we are dispensing with these incentives and stimulants to a rigorous execution of the law, throw down the bars in respect of requirements of which no just claim of hardship can be made and which will be likely not only to imperil the end we have in view, but to disparage the better and more solid parts of this legislation?

Take moieties from the law, take away the power to inspect books and papers—these things are complained of by just men, and at these the pending bill is aimed. But beware how we unsettle the law generally in other respects in which its working is only for the punishment of the guilty, and for the safety of the public right.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is due from me to the Senator from New York to say in relation to the bill reported by the Committee on Finance in regard to this particular subject, which made precisely the same change that is made here, that at the time I was directed to report it by the Committee on Finance I was informed by a member of the committee that Judge Clifford had made a decision that in case of undervaluation the only article that should be forfeited by the law was the special article that was undervalued. Since that I have learned that my informant was mistaken, but I understand from the Senator from Massachusetts, who has been recently charged with the office of Secretary of the Treasury, that the decisions of the different courts have not always been in harmony; that some have held to the entire forfeiture of the invoice and some to the forfeiture only of the undervalued article.

But, Mr. President, it seems to be argued by the Senator from New York that this case does not apply to mere undervaluation. Why in any case of undervaluation, no matter how small it may be, where fraud is actually imputed as being known to the importer at the time, the article is confiscated accordingly. Take an article of fine handkerchiefs or gloves that have expensive cartons in which they are placed. If merely the cartons are not put into the invoice there is a technical fraud and a fraud that amounts to sufficient to forfeit under existing laws the entire invoice.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I interrupt my friend if I ask him a question?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Does not this section which we are dealing with put beyond all doubt the question which he now raises when it provides "that any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make, or attempt to make any entry of imported merchandise, by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement," &c.—does not that put the case beyond all question upon the ground of willful, intentional fraud?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Undoubtedly; and the courts construe any undervaluation as a willful fraud. In the other portions of this bill we leave the smuggler to the existing laws, subject to all the pains and penalties imposed by them. Those laws will stand precisely as they are now. It is only proposed in this section to provide that there shall be a uniformity of decisions upon this question in cases of fraudulent undervaluation, that that shall only relate to and taint the particular article that is undervauled. I do not desire to consume further time.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, it seems to many to be very unjust to inflict such a penalty upon what some regard as so slight a crime. It seems to many that it would be unjust to do anything more than to require of him who dishonestly imported his goods, who made a fraudulent invoice or attempted in any way to defraud the revenue, the forfeiture of the article which he invoiced below the cost. It is in my judgment a false sympathy with the man who attempts thus to defraud the revenue. I have no sympathy for the man who attempts such a fraud, and if in the face of it he should be called upon to forfeit ten times as much as the value of the article which he invoiced below its cost, if he knew it beforehand, I should be willing to have that penalty inflicted upon him provided he was guilty. If he would go forward in the face of such a threatened penalty and undertake to drive his neighbor out of a business which he was prosecuting fairly and in fair competition, then I say put the severest penalty upon him.

I have sympathy for the honest merchants; I have known many of them in the city of New York; and I do not hesitate to say that if you will go through that city to-day and inquire of those who have retired from the importing business and ask them the reason why they retired, you will find many of them to give you this answer: that they could not compete with a certain class of men who bring into the city the same descriptions of goods invoiced at less prices than they could buy them abroad; and in that way in their judgment willfully defrauding the revenue, and by that fraud driving them from their legitimate business. I say I have great sympathy for this class of men, and I would like to have Congress impose any penalty, however severe, upon men who should attempt dishonestly to drive them from their business.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The question I understand to be whether an attempt to defraud the revenue shall forfeit the whole amount of an invoice or forfeit only the particular article in which the fraud is alleged to exist. The section applies not only to the owner and the importer, but visits the act of every agent with the penalty prescribed in the section. How will it operate in case a merchant in New York, for instance, is in Europe purchasing goods, who sends them home to an agent here, who makes his affidavit at the custom-house, and who omits, willfully or by accident, to account for a single article. Is the honest merchant who is across the water attending to his business, for the single act of the agent, though it may have been a willful act of the agent—is the honest merchant who has no connection with that transaction to forfeit the whole of the goods imported? It seems to me we ought to be careful before we provide such penalties. It is true the agent who will willfully attempt to cheat and defraud the Government deserves the severest penalty himself; but is the honest man who by the act of his agent has been involved in this thing to be punished in that kind of way? It seems to me we ought to be exceedingly careful how we visit upon an honest merchant such severe penalties for the acts of his agent or consignee when he himself may be perfectly innocent. I call attention to that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. OGLESBY.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance to the twelfth section.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PRATT. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] who was compelled to leave a short time since; if he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Mitchell, Oglesby, Pease, Ramsey, and Spencer—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Cooper, Davis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Hitchcock, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Patterson, Pratt, Schurz, Scott, Sprague, Stewart, and West—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHANDLER. As it is decided that it is too harsh a punishment for the intentional smuggler to be mulcted in pecuniary damages, I would like to test the sense of the Senate and see whether they are too tender to punish him by imprisonment in the State prison for not exceeding five years. I therefore move in line 16, after the words "United States," to insert "and to imprisonment not exceeding five years."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not an amendment to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I give notice that when it shall be in order I shall offer the amendment and ask for the yeas and nays upon it, to see whether the smuggler is really to be punished at all.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is not being pressed now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BAYARD. In line 21 of this section, after the words "for the" and before the word "confiscation," the words "forfeiture or" should be inserted; so as to read: "And anything contained in any act which provides for the forfeiture or confiscation of an entire invoice," &c. This amendment is acceptable to the chairman of the Committee on Finance in charge of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is properly an amendment to the amendment of the Committee on Finance. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. It is in aid of the section, and the amendment is acceptable to the chairman.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Now the question I think is on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As amended.

Mr. CONKLING. I think I shall ask for the yeas and nays, and that in the hope that the Senate will not sustain it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I think the words which are proposed to be inserted had better be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed in line 15 of section [10] 12 to strike out "as aforesaid;" and in lines 16, 17, and 18 to strike out—

Liable to forfeiture, which forfeiture shall apply only to the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud, or alleged fraud, relates.

And in lieu of these words to insert:

Forfeited; which forfeiture shall only apply to the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud, or alleged fraud, relates; and anything contained in any act which provides for the forfeiture or confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. PRATT. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boutwell, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Mitchell, Pease, Ramsey, and Spencer—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Robertson, Schurz, Scott, Sprague, and Stewart—28.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section [11] 13, line 13, to insert after the words "satisfactory to the court" the words "or judge thereof."

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not rise to object to the amendment proposed, but to give notice that when it is in order I shall move to strike out all after the word "fines," in the ninth line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance last read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section [12] 14, line 19, after the word "shall" to insert the words "in the absence of protest;" so that the section will read:

SEC. [12] 14. That wherever any statute requires that, to the cost or market value of any goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, there shall be added to the invoice thereof, or, upon the entry of such goods, wares, and merchandise, charges for inland transportation, commissions, port duties, expenses of shipping, export duties, cost of packages, boxes, or other articles containing such goods, wares, and merchandise, or any other incidental expenses attending the packing, shipping, or exportation thereof from the country or place where purchased or manufactured, the omission, without intent thereby to defraud the revenue, to add and state the same on such invoice or entry shall not be cause of a forfeiture of such goods, wares, and merchandise, or of the value thereof; but in all cases where the same, or any part thereof, are omitted, it shall be the duty of the collector or appraiser to add the same, for the purposes of duty, to such invoice or entry, either in items or in gross, at such price or amount as he shall deem just and reasonable, (which price or amount shall, in the absence of protest, be conclusive,) and to impose and add thereto the further sum of 100 per cent. of the price or amount so added; which addition shall constitute a part of the dutiable value of such goods, wares, and merchandise, and shall be collectible as provided by law in respect to duties on imports.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section [13] 15, line 4, to insert after the word "the" the words "collector of the district, whose duty it shall be promptly to report the same to the;" so that section will read:

SEC. [13] 15. That it shall be the duty of any officer or person employed in the customs-revenue service of the United States, upon detection of any violation of the customs laws, forthwith to make complaint thereof to the collector of the district, whose duty it shall be promptly to report the same to the district attorney of the district in which such frauds shall be committed. Immediately upon the receipt of such complaint, if in his judgment it can be sustained, it shall be the duty of such district attorney to cause investigation into the facts to be made before a United States commissioner having jurisdiction thereof, and to initiate proper proceedings to recover the fines and penalties in the premises, and to prosecute the same with the utmost diligence to final judgment.

Mr. CONKLING. Before we vote upon the amendment to this section, I ask the chairman of the committee or some other member of it to tell us what it means.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator in charge of this bill has necessarily been called from the Chamber, and the gentleman whom he desired to speak for him in his absence is also absent from his seat. The amendment I think explains itself.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not inquire as to the amendment, for I think so too, but I do not understand the section.

Mr. BAYARD. The section is as it came to us from the House.

Mr. CONKLING. I know it, but I cannot conceive what it means.

Mr. BAYARD. The object of the section it seems to me is very apparent and very obvious. It provides for the lodging of information, the lodging of complaint. The House proposed that the district attorney should be the person to whom this information should be carried. The Senate committee thought it proper that the collector of the district should be interposed, giving a point to which information of supposed violations of the customs laws should always be directed. Unless there be some official designated to whom information should be directed, it is quite possible that the person having information would not know precisely what channel his action should take. This directs him to the proper officer. The House thought it should be the district attorney. The Committee on Finance on consideration thought the collector of customs, who again should advise the district attorney, would be the proper officer to receive the information. There is nothing more in the section than that it provides for the point at which information shall be lodged in order to put the laws in force for the enforcement of the collection of the revenue. There is nothing else in the section that I can see, and nothing else in the section that I believe was suggested to the committee except that it seems very properly to subject the complain tto a canvass by the collector of the district, so that in trivial or frivolous cases in which no violation has really occurred, in which the informant is mistaken, there need be nothing further done in the matter. I do not see anything else in the section, but I can see in the section a very important and useful feature to make the law what we intended, practically beneficial.

Mr. CONKLING. In asking the question of the Senator from Delaware, I declared my inability to comprehend this section. It is due that I should explain my remark. The section, if I understand it, and I ask the attention of the lawyers of the Senate especially to it, requires any officer who detects a violation of the revenue laws to report it to the collector. It then requires the collector to report it to the district attorney, and provides that—

Immediately upon the receipt of said complaint, if in his judgment it can be sustained—

I do not stop to comment upon the fact that it is difficult to see how the district attorney, who has no subordinates for this purpose, is to ascertain whether it can be sustained—it shall be the duty of such district attorney to cause investigation into the facts to be made before a United States commissioner having jurisdiction thereof.

I inquire who that United States commissioner is, where he lives, and how he spells his name? No United States commissioner has any civil jurisdiction. There is but one case that I can think of in which he has civil jurisdiction, and that is where the court makes a reference of some particular matter to a commissioner as a reference is made to a master or reference to inquire of some question and report. If any member of the body knows of any other case in which a United States commissioner has civil jurisdiction, of course he will correct me. I do not.

The jurisdiction of a commissioner is wholly criminal; and yet this section provides that all cases whatever of alleged fraud on the revenue are to be carried to the district attorney and he is to proceed before a commissioner; of course he may proceed in no other way. It will be observed that every one of these alleged violations of law must be inquired of by a "proceeding." What proceeding? I ask the Senator from Delaware what is this proceeding? What is the form of the proceeding? Is some one to be arrested? My friend from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] says a "proper proceeding." Yes, he is "to initiate proper proceedings." I inquire what proceeding would be proper or even possible in any civil case?

Mr. BAYARD. It depends upon the statute that the district attorney supposes has been infringed. He has a right to apply to a commissioner to have the party held to bail; and that is an every-day occurrence.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I understand my friend then to mean that this provision extends only to criminal cases?

Mr. BAYARD. It can only apply to cases in which a commissioner has jurisdiction.

Mr. CONKLING. Precisely; and that is the point of my objection. I venture to say with deference to the committee and with the more freedom as this section came from the House and not from the commiteee, that it provides absolutely nothing to be done in a very large portion of all the instances of fraud. Unless you give the commissioner jurisdiction in rem, it is idle to talk about proceeding at all in a large proportion of the cases. I grant that where there is some one who can be arrested, and if the district attorney knows that in the first instance, he can proceed. This can be in only one way. He may arrest a culprit for smuggling, as he might for counterfeiting or for any other offense, and, as the Senator says, he could be held to bail or bound over, and the criminal action proceeds; but the Senator is aware that these proceedings, I might say in a great majority of instances, are civil in their character. They are proceedings in rem and other proceedings civil in their nature, and of none of these has the commissioner any jurisdiction whatever; and yet the provision is that it shall be the duty of the district attorney to proceed only in a way which in many cases is no way at all.

Mr. BAYARD. There is no lack of criminal penalties or punishments for every offense against the revenue laws. There can scarcely be one imagined that there is not a punishment by fine and imprisonment. Now, in lieu of the system of paying money and getting out of these offenses by the mere payment of money, which passes to informers, it is proposed—and this I suppose is a feature of the bill in harmony with that proposed action—that there shall be no condonation of criminal offenses, but prosecution of criminal offenses. I can see in this section nothing that does not lead to the more thorough prosecution of offenders, subject to the proper judgment of the district attorney and the collector that a case has arisen in which a prosecution should be set on foot. That is all. Whether or not the civil suit can take this shape, is a matter of no particular importance, because there are plenty of other avenues for that. If this shall provide for criminal prosecutions even, it will be useful; and to say that it cannot provide for other than criminal prosecutions is not saying anything against it. If the section shall provide for the prompt prosecution upon the criminal side of violations of the revenue laws, it certainly should be retained. I see no objection to it. That the collector is the proper person to receive this first information, instead of the district attorney, I think is a very proper amendment on the part of the Committee on Finance.

I do not consider the section of any very great value, because I apprehend the information would be lodged and the prosecution would go on. This simply provides that it shall be lodged with a certain officer who shall proceed in a certain way. If it be incompatible with the former law giving jurisdiction to commissioners, it will not be done, because the section provides for proper proceedings to be initiated. I take it that means proper proceedings both civil and criminal, civil proceedings in the proper form and criminal proceedings in the usual and proper way. I see no objection, therefore, to the section. It may not be as full and complete as it might be; but so far as it goes, it goes in the right direction.

There was in the hands of the chairman of the committee a paper properly belonging to him which came from the Treasury Department containing some comments upon this bill after it had been printed by the Senate, and the comment from the Department on this section 13 I will read:

Section 13 is unnecessary, and its operation would probably be injurious. It is now the duty of subordinate officers to report every infraction of law discovered by them to their superiors, and it is thereupon the duty of the latter to take such further steps as may be necessary to protect the interests of the United States.

The rights of subordinate officers as informers, and the consequent inducement to vigilance, are not improved by the section in question.

The only good effect which might possibly result from the section, if retained, would be to prevent the superior officer from suppressing the case, by which he might become subject to the penalty in section [17] 15. If this contingent danger be of sufficient magnitude to justify the ignoring of the officer who is chiefly responsible for the administration of the customs-revenue law in his district, then the section should be retained, but it might be modified by requiring the subordinate to make duplicate reports, one to the district attorney and the other to the collector.

That suggestion was taken by making the report first to the collector and making it his duty to report over again to the district attorney. I did not then, and I do not now, consider the section of any great importance. I think it is more practical as it is now than when it came from the Committee on Finance. I see no objection to it but rather recommendation, in that it provides for the point at which official information shall be received and then the duties of these parties commence. If the description of the proceedings is technically insufficient, still I do not think it would oust the proper jurisdiction when the district attorney should apply to it. If the section shall be, under the criticism of the Senator from New York, restrained simply to criminal or quasi criminal cases, still the proper proceedings which are mentioned in the eleventh line of the section will be instituted in the proper forum for the punishment of the offense and the mulcting of the offender.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It seems to me that this section does not add anything to the value of the revenue system and in some degree tends to confuse and make doubtful what is now clear. It is the duty of every officer to report to his superior officer. It might happen that a report to be made by any officer could not properly be made to the collector of any port, but should be made directly to the Department. Now it is the duty of the district attorney when a case is laid before him, upon his judgment, to prosecute both on the civil and the criminal side; and that is all that is provided for in this section.

I suppose it is not in order now to move to strike out the section, but I certainly think it ought to be omitted from the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The purpose of this section in the House of Representatives, as shown by the debate, was to cut off the condonation or settlement of cases of penalties by subordinate officers.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Has anybody the evidence of a single instance of that sort ever occurring in the administration of the revenue laws? Is there any such case anywhere?

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot give particular cases.

Mr. BOUTWELL. There is no such case.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know the purpose of the House was to prevent collectors of customs from condoning cases of violation of law.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That would be an offense. It has never been proved. Within my knowledge there has never been any evidence tending to show that any collector of customs has ever settled a case.

Mr. SHERMAN. That purpose is manifest on the face of this section. The House of Representatives therefore made it the imperative duty of every officer who ascertained that the revenue laws had been violated in any particular to report directly to the district attorney, and then made it imperative on the district attorney to take the requisite proper proceedings to enforce the penalty or punish the crime. We saw that that ignored the collector, who is chiefly responsible for the collection of the revenue, and therefore when the Secretary of the Treasury pointed out to us that this apparently relieved the officer who detected frauds from reporting to the collector who was responsible for the collection of the revenue, and required him to report directly to the district attorney, we saw that was objectionable.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not object to the amendment. If the section stands, the amendment is pertinent and proper; but I think the whole section should be omitted.

Mr. SHERMAN. That may be; but I doubt very much whether the section ought not to stand. The purpose is that, when an offense is committed, punishment shall be sure and certain, and that the case shall be placed in the hands of the legal officers. I can imagine many cases of the violation of the revenue laws where it may be proper for the Secretary of the Treasury to relieve from the penalty. If this would prevent the Secretary of the Treasury or some proper officer from relieving from penalties in certain cases, I should concede that the section ought to be stricken out; but the purpose was to prevent the collector condoning these offenses, and therefore the section as it was framed skipped over the collector and made the special agent or any other revenue officer bound to report directly to the district attorney. We thought that was wrong, and hence have proposed the amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That was wrong undoubtedly; but the error I think is in supposing that cases are condoned or settled by the local officers. So far as I know such has not been the practice. Now, as to the prosecution of persons who violate the revenue laws, I think during my own experience we had an examination made of the dockets in the city of New York, and we found there—I state it from recollection—two thousand Government cases, civil and criminal, on the dockets of the United States courts in the city of New York, and the officers of the Government utterly unable to try them for the want of judicial facilities for doing the business.

THE CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee of conference on the currency bill I beg leave to submit a report, and ask to have it printed, and I give notice that to-morrow at the expiration of the morning hour I will ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Does the Senator desire to have the report read?

Mr. BOREMAN and others. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out all of the amendment after "that," in the first line, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, shall be hereafter known as "the national-bank act."

SEC. 2. That section 31 of "the national-bank act" be so amended that the several associations therein provided for shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations; but the moneys required by said section to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits in all respects, as provided for in the said section.

SEC. 3. That section 22 of the said act, and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said acts, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and the proviso in the first section of the act approved

July 12, 1870, entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," prohibiting the banks hereafter organized a circulation over $500,000; and the proviso in the third section of said act limiting the circulation of banks authorized to issue notes redeemable in gold coin to $1,000,000; and section 6 of said act relating to the redistribution of twenty-five millions of circulating notes be, and the same are hereby, repealed; that every association hereafter organized shall be subject to, and be governed by, the rules, restrictions, and limitations, and possess the rights, privileges, and franchises, now or hereafter to be prescribed by law as to national banking associations, with the same power to amend, alter, and repeal provided by "the national-bank act."

SEC. 4. That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act, and of the several acts amendatory thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used for the redemption of such circulation; which sum shall be counted as a part of its lawful reserve, as provided in section 2 of this act; and when the circulating notes of any such associations, assorted or unassorted, shall be presented for redemption, in sums of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, to the Treasurer of the United States, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Treasurer of the United States to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally, on the first day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; and whenever such redemptions for any association shall amount to the sum of $500, such association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum in United States notes equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed. And all notes of national-banks worn, defaced, mutilated, or otherwise unfit for circulation shall, when received by any assistant treasurer or at any designated depository of the United States, be forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States for redemption as provided herein. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed, the circulating notes so redeemed shall be forwarded to the respective associations by which they were issued; but if any of such notes are worn, mutilated, defaced, or rendered otherwise unfit for use, they shall be forwarded to the Comptroller of the Currency and destroyed and replaced as now provided by law: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the charges for transportation, and the costs for assorting such notes; and the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the cost of engraving such plates as shall be ordered by each association respectively; and the amount assessed upon each association shall be in proportion to the circulation redeemed, and be charged to the fund on deposit with the Treasurer: And provided further, That so much of section 32 of said national-bank act requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this section, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes, in whole or in part, may, upon the deposit of lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $9,000, take up the bonds which said association has on deposit with the Treasurer for the security of such circulating notes; which bonds shall be assigned to the bank in the manner specified in the nineteenth section of the national-bank act; and the outstanding notes of said association, to an amount equal to the legal-tender notes deposited, shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States, and destroyed as now provided by law: Provided, That the amount of the bonds on deposit for circulation shall not be reduced below $50,000.

SEC. 6. That the Comptroller of the Currency shall, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, cause the charter numbers of the association to be printed upon all national-bank notes which may be hereafter issued by him.

SEC. 7. That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $382,000,000, which shall be retired and reduced in the following manner only, to wit: within thirty days after circulating notes to the amount of $1,000,000 shall, from time to time, be issued to national banking associations under this act, in excess of the highest outstanding value thereof at any time prior to such issue, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to three-eighths of the circulating notes so issued, which shall be in reduction of the maximum amount of $382,000,000 fixed by this section; and such reduction shall continue until the maximum amount of United States notes outstanding shall be $300,000,000; and the United States notes so retired shall be canceled and carried to the account of the sinking fund provided for by the second clause of section 5 of the act approved on the 25th of February, 1862, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption and funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," and shall constitute a portion of said sinking fund. And the interest thereon computed at the rate of 5 per cent. shall be added annually to said sinking fund. But if the surplus revenue be not sufficient for this purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days notice of the time and place of sale, a sufficient amount of the bonds of the United States of the character and description prescribed in this act for United States notes to be then retired and canceled.

SEC. 8. That on and after the 1st day of January, 1878, any holder of United States notes to the amount of fifty dollars, or any multiple thereof, may present them for payment at the office of the Treasurer of the United States, or at the office of the assistant-treasurer at the city of New York; and thereupon he shall be entitled to receive, at his option, from the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized and required to issue in exchange for said notes an equal amount of either class of the coupon or registered bonds of the United States provided for in the first section of the act approved on the 14th of July, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and the act amendatory thereof, approved the 20th day of January, 4871, which bonds shall continue to be exempt from taxation as provided in said act: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury in lieu of such bonds may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue the United States notes so received either in exchange for coin at par, or, with the consent of the holder, in the redemption of bonds then redeemable at par, or in the purchase of bonds at not less than par, or to meet the current payments for the public service; and when used to meet current payments an equal amount of the gold in the Treasury shall be applied in redemption of the bonds known as five-twenty bonds.

SEC. 9. That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the principal of the public debt of the United States.

And the Senate agree to the same.

O. P. MORTON,
JOHN SHERMAN,
A. S. MERRIMON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
HORACE MAYNARD,
C. B. FARWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CAMERON. This is a very important question; certainly the most important to the country we have had during this session; perhaps more important in all its consequences than we shall have for years; and in order that we may have time to think about it, and clearly understand it, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. THURMAN. The report ought to be printed and laid over.

Mr. MORTON. That was my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order was entered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope we shall go on with and finish the moiety bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I think we had better not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to the motion. I hope the moiety bill will be finished to-night. I say to the friends of the bill, those who believe it is important to pass it, that, in the crowded state of business at this stage of the session, there is no other opportunity to press it. To-morrow it will be crowded out by a special order made by unanimous consent and by the report just made. I therefore ask for the yeas and nays on this motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. I am not to be scared by calling the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. CAMERON. I think this is so important a question that we ought to have a little time to think about it. I do not want any other question to come up in here now until the conference report is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the call for the yeas and nays be regarded as withdrawn and have a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to that suggestion, and the Senate will divide on the motion.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 12, noes 32.

So the motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 881) fixing the times of holding the circuit court of the United States in the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada.

The message also returned, agreeably to the request of the Senate, the bill (H. R. No. 3652) providing for publication of the revised statutes of the United States.

E. BOYD PENDLETON.

Mr. BOREMAN. There was an adverse report made this morning on the bill (S. No. 653) for the relief of E. Boyd Pendleton, late collector of internal revenue fifth district of Virginia, and the bill was indefinitely postponed. I did not notice it at the time. I move that the vote indefinitely postponing the bill be reconsidered and that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in pursuance of law, reports of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on private land claim in Mesilla colony grant, reported as No. 86, for land in Doña Aña County, New Mexico; on private land claim reported as No. 89, in the name of Manuel Trujillo, for land in Santa Fé County, New Mexico, known as the Talaya tract; and report on Refugio colony grant, being private land claim reported as No. 90, for land in Doña Aña County, New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REVISED STATUTES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 3652) providing for the publication of the revised statutes of the United States, which was returned from the House of Representatives in accordance with the request of the Senate.

The vote on the passage of the bill was reconsidered, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FOG-BELLS AND OTHER SIGNALS.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to enable the Light-House Board to continue its experiments in relation to fog-bells or other signals for the protection of the commercial marine.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3623) to amend the twenty-third paragraph of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853;

A bill (H. R. No. 3622) to amend the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789, in relation to bonds of clerks of the courts of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3621) to abolish the western district of Arkansas, and for other purposes.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. CONOVER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No 3572) to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

The proposed amendment is a follows:

That all sales of stocks, bonds, gold or silver bullion or coin, whether the same be made by the owner thereof or by any bank, banker, broker, or other persons, or by a corporation as agent for such owner, shall be taxed one-twentieth of 1 per cent. on the amount of such sale.

And on all contracts made by any of the persons aforesaid, or by any corporation, for the sale of any stocks, bonds, gold or silver bullion or coin, on which the full amount of purchase-money is not paid or to be paid in fact, or where such gold or silver bullion or coin, stocks, or bonds are deposited as security for the purchase-money, or where a settlement of the contract is made without an actual payment of the purchase-money and a delivery of the gold or silver bullion or coin, stocks or bonds, or where the gold or silver coin or bullion, stocks or bonds, contracted to be sold are not at the time bona fide the property of the seller and actually on hand at the time, there shall be paid a tax of one-tenth of 1 per cent. on the amount of such sale. And upon all contracts made by any person for himself or as agent for another for the sale of raw or unmanufactured cotton not bona fide the property of the seller and actually on hand at the time, there shall be paid a tax of one-tenth of 1 per cent on the amount of such contract. And at the time of the making of all sales on contracts of sale herein provided to be taxed there shall be made and delivered to the buyer by the seller or his agent a written or printed memorandum, signed by the seller or his agent, setting forth the name of the seller or contractor or that of his agent, the amount of the sale or contract, the matter or thing to which it relates, and the date thereof, and there shall be affixed thereto a lawful stamp or stamps, equal in value to the amount of the tax on such sale or contract; and in computing the amount in any case herein provided for any fractional part of $100 of value or amount on which the tax is computed shall be accounted at $100.

And any person liable to pay the taxes herein provided, or any one who acts in the matter as agent for such person, who shall make any such sale or contract, or who shall in pursuance of any such sale or contract deliver or receive any bullion, coin, stocks, or bonds, or cotton, without a memorandum such as is herein required to be made, or who shall deliver or receive such memorandum without having the proper stamps affixed thereto, shall forfeit and pay to the United States ten times the amount of the tax lawfully due and payable on such sale or contract, which may be recovered by suit with costs at any time within one year after the liability to such penalty shall have been incurred, and the provisions of the laws in relation to stamp duties on bank-checks or orders for the payment of money drawn on banks, bankers, or trust companies, except as to the amount of the stamp tax to be paid thereon, which are now in force shall apply to and govern the execution of the foregoing provisions for payment by stamps of the taxes herein imposed on such sales and contracts of sale of gold or silver bullion, coin, bonds, and cotton.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 435) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. No. 3623) to amend the twenty-third paragraph of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes, approved February 26, 1853;

A bill (H. R. No. 3622) to amend the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789, in relation to bonds of clerks of the courts of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3621) to abolish the western district of Arkansas, and for other purposes.

MOIETIES UNDER THE CUSTOMS LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 3171) to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment of the Committee on Finance to section [13] 15 will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Committee on Finance is to insert after the words "complaint thereof to the" the words "collector of the district, whose duty it shall be promptly to report the same to the."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was entirely convinced by what the Senator from Massachusetts said and from some little knowledge of my own about the practice under these laws, that this ought not to be agreed to, because, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, there are a great many of these reports that are not made directly to the district attorney or to the collector. Some of them ought to be made to the Treasury Department direct. I think, though I do not know whether the Senator from Massachusetts said that or not, that this whole section ought to be stricken out and the law in this respect left exactly as it is now. This particular section does not have anything to do with moieties in particular, and does not prevent people from doing exactly what they could do before either way, either to smuggle or to import goods according to law as might be most convenient. I think if you adopt this section it will pretty seriously interfere with the well-ordered and established methods of proceeding in ascertaining frauds upon the revenue that now exist. If the object be to upset the law altogether, and to provide an entirely new code so that nobody will know what to do or how to do it as it has been done before, so as to add to the general uncertainty or whatever you may call the rest of the bill, the section is right.

I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate when it has more important subjects under consideration; but as the Senator has just resolved to force us to consider this bill in heat rather than to do executive business and go home to dinner, we ought to consider it fully; and I was merely wishing to say in a single word that this fifteenth section, or thirteenth as it stands in the brackets, does not seem to be necessary to the symmetry of the rest of the bill, and it puts the operations of the Government in respects which have not hitherto been criticised, as the Senator from Massachusetts has stated, entirely out of joint. I cannot suppose, of course, that the Committee on Finance, in their just zeal and endeavor to protect the revenue and to protect importers and so on, have desired to interfere with the processes of the law in carrying out whatever the law may happen to be, and in the reports that are to be made in respect to frauds committed upon the revenue; and in that point of view I merely wished to say that it appeared to me that the whole section ought to be stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to say that the theory is that having somewhat reduced the amount of penalties and forfeitures in case of frauds, wherever there be one, it is the purpose that it shall be, without any restriction or limitation whatever, prosecuted and proceeded with to the end. It was designed that the law, such as it is, should be in all cases enforced.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is very inconsequential then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section [14] 16, in line 8, after the word "shall" to insert the word "have" and in the same line, after the word "joined," to strike out the words—

It shall be the duty of the court on the trial thereof to submit to the jury, as a distinct and separate proposition, whether the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States, and to require upon such proposition a special finding by such jury; or, if such issues be tried by the court without a jury, it shall be the duty of the court to pass upon and decide such proposition as a distinct and separate finding of fact; and in such cases, unless intent to defraud shall be so found, no fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall be imposed.

And to insert at the end of the section the words:

The court may, on its own motion, and shall, when requested so to do by either party, submit to the jury as a distinct and separate proposition, whether or not the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States, or may submit any other specific interrogatory material to a determination of the issue or issues joined, and require special findings thereon by the jury; or if such issues be tried by the court without a jury, it shall be the duty of the court, when requested so to do by either party, to find the facts, and enter the same as a part of the record.

So that the section will read:

SEC. [14] 16. That in all actions, suits, and proceedings in any court of the United States now pending or hereafter commenced or prosecuted to enforce or declare the forfeiture of any goods, wares, or merchandise; or to recover the value thereof, or any other sum alleged to be forfeited by reason of any violation of the provisions of the customs-revenue laws, or any of such provisions, in which action, suit, or proceeding an issue or issues of fact shall have been joined, the court may on its own motion, &c.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) It seems to me, with due submission to the committee, that that amendment would have the effect to acquit most of the persons who shall be charged with this offense. Every lawyer who has practiced at all in defending criminals understands that in a trial for murder, for instance, if he can get the court to put the direct and distinct question to the jury whether this man really killed the deceased from malice prepense or not, very likely some man on the jury who is perfectly willing to say he killed him and meant to kill him will doubt whether he meant to do it with malice prepense. In other words, it is the old dodge of all lawyers who defend criminals to separate the charge into as many elements as possible and confuse the jury as much as possible in order to prevent a conviction. This, like every other case where a man is charged with fraud, rests on all the circumstances. If you are to single out and put this particular question, which of course is the essence of the whole case, as a separate and distinct question and to require a special finding upon that, you will acquit three-fourths of the persons who are tried and who ought to be convicted.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, in old times there was no crime without an intent. Such was the law of reason, and it was the law of England. It has been altered in this country and altered mainly by decisions of United States courts, so that intent is inferred under circumstances where it ought not to be inferred and where the jury are tempted to err. Therefore it seems to me, to take the case the Senator from Wisconsin has put, that if in a trial for murder there is one single man on the jury who does not believe that the intent to kill with malice existed at the time of the killing, the party charged should not be found guilty of murder. In old times the questions were so put to the jury, and the jury were told by the court in their charge what murder was as defined by the law, and that murder could not exist without the full definition being filled, and the jury were told that they could not, under their oaths, find the man charged guilty, he having the right to the benefit of the doubt, unless they believed the whole definition of the crime to be filled. The highest penalty known to the law, the exaction of death itself, was given to a court and a jury under such circumstances, and never would have been trusted to them under any other circumstances.

But now by statutes which have been made, beginning mainly with the war, step by step men are lured into crimes which they never intended to commit, and the courts so tell the juries. One of the very best features of this movement, one of the very best features in this bill, in my judgment, is that men are not to be held guilty, their property sacrificed, their reputations ruined, under constructive frauds, when really there was no intent to violate the law of the land. Look at the internal-revenue cases; look at the forfeitures of distilleries, of tobacco manufactories; look at the humble men engaged in the small business of making clothes. Cases have occurred in my State where a man was keeping his account in a humble way, not being a book-keeper, and if his books were not kept according to rules and regulations too difficult, sir, for me or you to understand who have not been bred book-keepers, if his books were not kept exactly according to Gunter, if they were not precisely as was required by numerous specifications of the law and regulations, that man before a court and jury in the United States court stood no chance whatever; his property was confiscated, every dollar he had was taken away from him, and his reputation to boot; and then what was left for the lawyers but to come under these laws and beg for such clemency as was left in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue? This has occurred in my own State in reference to the very act now attempted to be amended, and in the courts of New York it has been a standing disgrace to the nation.

It is not only in reference to this bill, in which my constituents feel a great interest, that I speak, but it is in reference to this great evil that has grown up in the country. The evil is not in my humble judgment where the Senator from Wisconsin thinks it is. The danger is not under these constructive acts which are created by our statutes and which are sent to the United States courts. It is not that the criminal will escape. Many and many an innocent man has been ruined in reputation, as well as all his property taken, under these statutes who had no intent whatever to commit a crime. These acts are snares and delusions, and the American people are awakening to the fact. They believe in the old doctrine that crime cannot exist without an intent; and the stronger and the closer we keep to that definition, the more we insist upon it, the freer our Government will be.

The object of all statutes of this kind is to collect the revenue and punish the criminal. One man is more careful than another; one man is more precise in his business matters than another. To urge him to precision, to make him careful, may be the duty of the Government; but because he has ignored it or because his clerk has ignored it by carelessness, where from the exhibition of his whole accounts and all his papers he can show that there was no criminal intent on his part, to mulct him in fines and penalties, to ruin his reputation, to deny him the power to go before a jury of his peers and ask them to say whether he intended to do this or not, is to deprive him in my humble judgment of one of the dearest rights of any American citizen.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I entirely concur with my honorable friend from New Jersey in his definition of offenses. There must of course be an intention to do wrong in order to constitute a crime. That is not what I am talking about. I make no objection to a counsel who is retained for the defendant putting that point just as forcibly and speciously as he pleases; but the idea of putting into a statute which is intended to punish crime what is in and of itself one of the most usual and most effective devices of defendant's counsel, is a thing that strikes me as somewhat remarkable.

There is but one of two courses to be taken. If it is proposed to leave the honorable and high-minded people of the United States to pay their taxes and their duties on imported articles or not as they please, or, what is the same thing, leave it to their sense of honor in the matter, that is one thing. If, on the other hand, it is designed to collect the revenue, to see when the law fixes a duty that it is paid, when the law fixes a tax on whisky or tobacco that the Treasury shall receive it, then you must provide machinery to squeeze it out of the reluctant payer; and this provision instead of being machinery to accomplish that purpose is a very cunning device, it seems to me, to defeat that end.

For instance, these men, say in New York City, are to be tried before their neighbors and friends. They are wealthy. There are on the jury several men who associate with them in daily life. Such jurors will find a general verdict when all the facts in the case are established. If you prove, for instance, that Mr. John Smith, a very wealthy importer in New York, has done thus and so, has really done the things which the court will say amount to an offense, that jury will be very likely to convict; but if the judge is to take them and press them up to the other point, "Do you find that in doing these things this man actually intended to cheat and defraud the United States," do you think as many juries would find verdicts of guilty?

My objection to this amendment is that it seems to be a specious, cunning defense of the action you are directing to be prosecuted. A lawyer who should invent such a defense would be entitled to the thanks of his client; but I think such a provision is out of place in a statute designed to secure convictions.

I think the committee were entirely right in one-half of the amendment. They were right in striking out the provision of the House bill, under which I do not believe you could convict anybody. The amendment proposed by the committee of the Senate is better, because I think under it you might convict three-fourths of the persons that ought to be convicted.

Mr. THURMAN. O, no.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You could not convict one-fourth of them.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then it is worse than I thought it was. At all events it is bad enough.

Mr. THURMAN. The vice of this amendment as it seems to me consists in the insertion of the word "actual." You must find "an actual intention to defraud the United States." The effect of that would be to repeal that well-known maxim of the law that every man is presumed to know the law. A man would say: "It is very true I exhibited an invoice that was incorrect; I violated the law of the United States; but I did not know that that was the law of the United States; and therefore I never intended to defraud the United States." The law presumes that a man who does an unlawful act does it with an unlawful purpose. There are cases in which that may be rebutted, of course; but to require actual intent in every case is simply to say that the old maxim of the law that every man is presumed to know the law shall not obtain in these cases. That seems to me to be the vice of the amendment, and I think the word "actual" ought to be stricken out.

Then there is something more about this amendment which I do not understand, and upon which I should like to have a little light. As the text was in the bill as it came from the House, in the provision for these findings there was some effect given to the findings, for it was provided:

> And in such cases, unless intent to defraud shall be so found, no fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall be imposed.

That gave effect to the want of a finding of an actual intent. It was a complete defense. Now, our committee provide for the same kind of finding, but do not provide to give it any effect. They do not say that the absence of such a finding, or a finding that there was no such intention, shall operate as an acquittal. They simply say it shall be found and put on record. Cui bono? For what purpose is it to be put on record? There is to be a separate finding. The jury find the man guilty, and at the same time they find that he did not have an actual intent to defraud the Government of the United States, and that is put on record. There is a verdict of guilty, and side by side with it is a finding that there was no actual intent to defraud the Government of the United States. Is that for the purpose of enlightening the court as to whether it shall enter judgment? Is that to be treated as a special verdict? Who ever heard of a special verdict that found the party was guilty as charged in the indictment, with a codicil to it that he had no actual intent to violate the laws? I really do not see myself what is the use of this amendment as it is reported by the committee. As the House left the section it gave effect to it; there was something in it; but it ought not to be as the House had it, because the word "actual" should be stricken out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this is certainly a very extraordinary provision, both the one in the House bill and the Senate amendment. If any member of the committee who reported this bill has any knowledge in the history of law of there being put into a statute a charge that the court shall deliver to the jury upon the subject of the case before it, I should be glad to be informed of that instance. But I take it for granted that our committee or the House committee claim this as a new invention of theirs, as the truth is I believe for the first time in the history of any country that has had a civilized jurisprudence or legislation, you undertake to guide the course of judicial proceedings by declaring what sort of a charge a judge upon the facts and law before him shall deliver to the jury. I think it would be safe to say, in anything except this moiety act as it is called, if the Committee on the Judiciary of either House of Congress were to bring in a bill respecting any other criminal prosecution in which they should undertake to declare what the charge of the judge should be, they would be hooted out of court pretty quick, for the reason that it would destroy all liberty on the one side and would destroy the security of the community upon the other.

No judicial proceeding can be safe, either for the protection of the community or for the vindication of an innocent party accused, that undertakes to declare the sort of a charge in form or in substance that the court shall give to the jury on the trial. All that you can do for the safety of the community and of the individual is to declare in the law plainly what the offense shall be, and then leave it to the judge untrammeled to declare, in applying that definition to the facts and circumstances that are brought out, what the law is and what the jury are to find under the circumstances of that particular case. It would be impossible in the clearest case that a lawyer or judge can imagine to make it safe as a rule to lay down that the judge in any instance should give a particular charge to a traverse jury as to the case and the circumstances before it. I submit to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, with his large knowledge of the law, that this is against all human experience as it respects the true way to protect communities and to protect citizens; that it is not safe to do it.

But let us look at some other considerations. Perhaps I am wrong about this. It may be that all the criminal and penal statutes of the United States ought to have laid down in them precisely what kind of a charge should be submitted to the jury upon the prominent topics in the case, so that all the judge would be obliged to do would be, as committees of Congress are sometimes said to do, employ a clerk to take the testimony, and when that is through, go into court and read the statute to the jury which contained the charge which the law declared he should give, and then go home again and leave the jury to their own devices; but I cannot imagine that that was the purpose of this provision. The purpose was no doubt to endeavor to assist the courts in ascertaining in a particular case whether a particular law had been violated. But the difficulty is, as has been pointed out by the Senators from Ohio and Wisconsin, you so hamper this, leaving no judicial judgment to the judge to apply the law to the facts of the case, that he is obliged in every instance of any criminal prosecution or any civil prosecution, as you will observe if you will look at the beginning of this section, to deliver this iron-bound and iron-clamped charge to the jury if either party requests it; and of course the defendant will request it every time, because it enables him to more complicate, if he be guilty, the transaction, and to get out of it if he may; and with a jury that was not well taught there would be equal, or certainly in a degree nearly equal, danger on the other side from the fact that the judge was obliged to give a particular charge, and in the very words of the statute, or otherwise his judgment would be reversed; that even an innocent man might find himself cramped in the ten thousand complications that no man can foresee and provide against that arise in the course of a criminal trial or a civil action. It is impracticable for any code of legislative jurisprudence to point out in advance what the judge shall say to the jury in respect to the form or in respect to the substance of their finding. All that you can do, according to my small information of human experience, is to lay down your law declaring clearly what is to constitute the offense, and then give the court the jurisdiction to try it, and stop there. Then the judge, if he is honest and understands his duty, (as we must assume that he is or we had better have no government at all,) is enabled to take the case as the evidence discloses it and the law of the offense as it is defined, and put the two together before the jury in his own way; and if he puts them in a way that is injurious to justice or contrary to law, there is redress.

But look a little further at another branch of this provision, because I am now only speaking of this generally, and see where you are. It is to be an element that the jury shall find that there was an actual intention to defraud the United States. An actual intention by whom? Of course by the party who is under prosecution. That is the crucial point. Who is the party under prosecution? It is the consignee, the importer. You cannot get the foreigner who has undertaken to make the false invoice on the other side and to send it over here, and if you did get him you could not convict him, because he has not committed any crime against the laws of the United States. All that he has done has been done in a foreign country where there is no law of the United States which prohibits his doing any such thing. What then? Under this amendment the jury must find that the importer—not his agent abroad, but the man at the bar or the defendant in the action—has been guilty of an actual fraud. He goes to the custom-house and produces his invoice, swears to it, actually defrauds the revenue of the United States out of a thousand dollars in the given case.

Mr. CONKLING. He does not even need to swear to it himself. His broker or agent may swear to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am coming to that. I am putting the strongest case that can be put. He goes to the custom-house, produces his invoice, swears to it, gets his permit, and lands his goods, and you prosecute him. Every honest importer has been defrauded because his coimporter undersells him. Every tax-payer in the United States has been defrauded because so much money that belonged to the Treasury has not been paid into it. Those are facts that have occurred, whether the particular importer knew what he was swearing about or did not; whether it was true or false. The honest importer has been wronged, and the Treasury and the tax-payer have been wronged; and yet a jury might be bound to acquit this man because when he is placed upon trial he says, "I did not know that; the junior partner in my firm made this arrangement and cheated the revenue; I did not know it; and my goods, the goods of the junior partner, the goods of the firm, cannot be forfeited." This is not a matter of personal punishment by an indictment against a man under the crimes act for committing a fraud on the revenue; but you will observe it in an action of any kind brought to enforce a forfeiture of the goods or to recover the value thereof or any larger sum in respect to the revenue. Therefore, if the United States had brought a suit, if it could, to recover the difference between the true duty and the false one, this section as it stood in the House bill or as it stands reported by the Committee on Finance, would absolutely defeat the recovery of that money which was due to the United States, unless the jury should find that the very person under trial actually intended to defraud the United States, knowing all the circumstances under which the transaction took place.

But, as the Senator from New York has suggested, it is not necessary even that the importer should swear to the invoice. He can pick up anybody in the streets who acts as a broker for him, who may swear to it, although he may not have the slightest idea about the circumstance at all. And yet you are going to say that nothing shall be done about it, because, I repeat, it is not merely a personal punishment; it is any sort of procedure by which the United States are to get redress. That is what the section provides, that nothing shall be done about it, and the fraud in effect upon the people and upon the honest importer shall go on unless the jury, under the direction of the judge on this precise point, shall find that the very party whom they have before them had actually intended to defraud the United States.

Take another instance. When I tread on the domain of the Committee on Finance I must be very careful in what I say, but I believe the laws of the United States made classifications of various kinds of goods, and if they fall within one class they are to pay a duty at a certain price, and if they fall within another class they are to pay a lower price. I believe that is so.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. As to wool it is so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As to wool it is so certainly. Other goods are to pay a duty according to the number of threads to the square inch.

Mr. WEST. Sugar is in another class.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then another class, as my friend from Louisiana suggests, is sugar. Very well. The importer of sugar, or cottons, or wool, as the case may be puts his goods in a class where a less duty is to be paid. By and by a suit is brought to recover the balance of that duty. But when the defendant comes in and is asked to pay back merely the money he has kept out of the Treasury, not to suffer any personal punishment at all, he says, "O, no, the jury must find that I actually intended to defraud the United States; I put my clerks to counting the threads in this cotton or silk or in the wool, or to sample the sugar, and they reported to me that it belonged in the cheapest class, as they naturally would. I did not know it was not true and I put it in therefore I must be acquitted entirely. You cannot enforce any forfeiture. You cannot collect any sum of money."

Then, as the Senator from Ohio has said, take another step. The importer comes forward as he often does and says, "I understood the law to be that I might put this in this class, and therefore if I have made a mistake it is a mistake of law; I did not actually intend to defraud the United States; I thought the law authorized me to do this thing; to be sure I knew that all my coimporters entered the same class of goods in a higher grade, under a different head, but I thought they were paying more duty than the law provided, and I entered mine under the lower. Now, then, unless the jury find that I was a good lawyer and understood the law, and, knowing it, intended to break it, I am not only not to be punished, I am not only not to be exposed to the forfeiture of my property, but I am, positively, as this section reads, not obliged to respond in any sum." The language of the section is:

> Or any other sum alleged to be forfeited by reason of any violation of the provisions of the customs-revenue laws, or any of such provisions, in which action, suit, or proceeding on issue or issues of fact shall have been joined.

Mr. President, do you really intend to open that kind of a statute to the honest American people, who do not want to violate your laws; to the honest American people, who in some way have got to pay the taxes to carry on your Government and pay its debts? I cannot believe that you do. I cannot imagine, when you turn over here again to what is the definition of smuggling, that the committee intend to have the definition of smuggling go hand in hand with this procedure; and yet it seems to do so as the bill is drawn. I find on the third page that—

> For the purposes of this act—

Not for the purposes of this section in which it occurs, but for the purposes of the whole act—> smuggling shall be construed to mean the act, with intent to defraud, of bringing into the United States, or, with like intent, attempting to bring into the United States dutiable articles without passing the same, or the package containing the same, through the custom-house, or submitting them to the officers of the revenue for examination.

That is all there is of smuggling. If I only bring them to the custom-house, no matter how corrupt my intention may be, no matter though I may have bribed that very custom-house officer in order to get them through, if I only lay them at his door or bring them into his presence on the northern border of the State of Vermont, my duty is done, and the law by statute declares that I am not a smuggler, that there is no forfeiture for that.

That being all that there is of smuggling, the omission to bring the thing to the knowledge of the customs officer, you may cheat him as much as you like, you may corrupt him as much as you like, you may undervalue as much as you like, you may go through the whole list of fraud and corruption, and if you can only deceive him or corrupt him, you stand free of any guilt in respect to smuggling. You are not a smuggler because you do not fall within the definition, guilt in that respect being only the keeping of the goods away from the sight of the custom-house or of the official that belongs to it.

Now turn over to this section and come to the provision for the enforcement of these things, and you find that this section covers again the whole ground just as the definition of smuggling does:

> That in all actions, suits, and proceedings in any court of the United States now pending or hereafter commenced or prosecuted to enforce or declare the forfeiture of any goods, wares, or merchandise, or to recover the value thereof, or any other sum alleged to be forfeited by reason of any violation of the provisions of the customs-revenue laws, or any of such provisions, in which action, suit, or proceeding an issue or issues of fact shall have been joined—

The judge shall charge the jury so and so. What are you going to do then? You find here you have got a case where the man has brought in his goods contrary to law; but has brought them to the custom-house and the custom-house officer has been deceived, or the custom-house officer not being deceived has been corrupted, or negligent. Then under this act when you come to see what you are to do, you turn and find that the respondent is accused of smuggling. He disproves that at once. You have several counts, if the district attorney does his duty and he will cover the whole ground. You will find the custom-house officer did see this. It was in his presence. It was in a wagon that went by, and he saw the wagon and the package. What on the next ground? On the next ground he says the jury must find that I made false invoices. There is nothing else, because when you step out of the ground of regular importation and bring in goods without the payment of duties, and that is not put in this you observe, it is only the bringing in of dutiable goods without bringing them to the custom-house; that is all. Then the man says, "I believed the law authorized me to bring those goods in free, I did not feel obliged to pay any duty; I did not know but there might be some question about it, and I thought it best to bring them to the custom-house." The surest way of wise men, astute men, to commit crime is to do it with the greatest possible appearance of innocence, and with the greatest publicity possible in the nature of things and put a bold face on it. Then he says: "I thought these goods were under the reciprocity treaty; I had not heard that the reciprocity treaty had been abrogated; I knew there was one that was to continue; and I leave it to a jury of my fellow-smugglers on the border to determine whether I actually intended to defraud." Actually intended to defraud how? "It is only smuggling by failing to bring the goods to the custom-house. I brought them to the custom-house. I therefore was not guilty of smuggling."

When you come to the invoices, what then? A great many goods on the northern border are brought in every day without any invoices, and the law does not require any invoices. They come in carriages and all manner of ways, and a written invoice or a written certificate of the consul and all that kind of verification is not used at all, and the law does not require it, because you cannot do business in neighborhood transactions across the border in that way. Then the man goes free altogether.

I do not believe that this is the wisest way to rectify all the wrongs that people say so often have been committed in the city of New York and in other large cities by men who are informers and who get moieties, preying upon the necessities of honest men who have no means to defend themselves like Phelps, Dodge & Co. and the other men of that ilk, and who are so impertinent as to have their books not seized, but to receive their books which they surrendered themselves and find in them the circumstances which lead such people to force upon the Treasury of the United States against its will the payment of a large sum of money. That cannot be, Mr. President.

The real fact is, and I may as well say it now once for all—although perhaps it is not very wise in a tactical point of view to say so, but as I am not a tactician I will say here now—in my opinion it will be found that this bill will work a great deal more injury to the cause of morals, which has been spoken of, I believe, in connection with it, a great deal more injury to honest importers, a great deal more injury to the tax-payers and the Treasury of the United States, than the law as it now exists, and that if this bill passes, as I am to assume that it will, being reported by the leading committee of the body, four years will not go over your head, Mr. President, before this Senate will find itself obliged to take the back track, if it, as it no doubt does, shall intend to protect the revenue and to protect innocent parties both, and to restore in substance the present body of the law which clearly defines and clearly points out the punishment of the illegal and vicious introduction of dutiable goods into the United States; and that, like any other agency of the law, when you have laid down such a thing for the protection of innocent people and tax-payers and the punishment of the guilty, you cannot execute the statute without taking the natural and necessary means to do so. You will never be able to collect the revenues of the United States with anything like certainty, with anything like fullness; you will never be able to protect the innocent importers, ninety-nine out of a hundred as they are now, who never have any trouble at the custom-houses, and who only have one invoice to present and have no secret one or another book in their counting-room, and who are entitled to some protection—you never will be able to protect them against fraudulent importations and therefore underbidding the market against them, unless you use the natural and necessary means to carry on the investigations necessary to the purposes of justice.

Why, Mr. President, in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, and which has been supposed to be somewhat fond of private rights and individual liberty, no man's books and papers can be withheld from any judicial investigation. If my neighbors have a controversy in which any entry in my books is material to the decision of their cause, I am bound summarily to produce them. If I have a controversy with my neighbor in which I believe that any entry in his books is material to the question, he is bound to produce them, and produce them without delay. And yet when you come to the protection of the interests of the whole community, the innocent importer and the tax-payer, and ask to lay your hands upon the books of a commercial firm, upon affidavit of probable cause, to bring them up for examination in order that the revenue may be protected, everybody holds up his hands in horror and says, "What an invasion of private rights, what an outrage upon Magna Charta, what a shame to a moral and civilized community that the private papers of A B should be exposed to public gaze!"

Why, Mr. President, this is carrying fancy a little too far. There is nothing about the private papers of any citizen, if he is an honest man, that relate to his business transactions which he need to be ashamed to produce anywhere, or which he ought to be unwilling to produce anywhere when in the judgment of the judicial tribunals of the country the purposes of justice require that those books should be brought forward. I do not believe there is a State in the Union in which the law does not go as far or farther in respect to the seizure and examination and production (because that is all it comes to) of private books and papers as any act of Congress that is now upon the statute-book; and yet you are here building up a contrivance which you think is to stop frauds on the revenue of all kinds, and in the same breath declaring that the judicial tribunals of the country shall have no means which are adequate to its being carried into effect; there shall be no means of reaching the evidence which is to compel the party to pay his duties or to pay the penalty for not paying them; there shall be no means of reaching the evidence which is to protect the innocent importer who does pay his duties; and at the same time when you catch one of these men and bring him to the jury, then you are to lay down in advance by statute a charge which the court is obliged in the very words of the statute of course to put to the jury, which would leave them to judge not only of the facts which the man has committed, whether they show an intent to defraud, but also, as the Senator from Ohio so well said, leave them to judge whether he was sufficiently wise about the law in order to make him responsible for breaking it. You cannot carry on a civilized community in that way longer than one administration. If I wanted to break down this Administration before the next three years, I should be glad to saddle the republican party with the responsibility under a claim of this kind of taking a step of this sort, because the three years are long enough to have it appear precisely where you will land.

Now, Mr. President, having made my protest against this thing, and as I say no doubt in respect to this particular amendment very unwisely in a tactical point of view, I conclude.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I will not attempt to discuss any other features of the bill than the amendment immediately under consideration; but I cannot withhold an expression of regret that we were not favored yesterday with the able advocacy of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] in favor of that amendment reported by the committee which would have enabled the courts to get the books and papers of fraudulent importers for the purpose of putting them in evidence to meet just the issues that are provided for by this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So do I regret it.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not now remember whether the Senator was present or not. I have a faint recollection that it was stated that he was not well enough to be in the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry to tell the Senator that I was confined to my house by illness. If I had been here I should have voted with him.

Mr. SCOTT. I was expressing my regret that we had not his assistance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In rather a sarcastical way.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Vermont is so good a judge of sarcasm that I can hardly dispute his judgment if he says I am sarcastic.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly am, because I have an opportunity of seeing it every day.

Mr. SCOTT. Now as to the amendment immediately under consideration, it has been suggested that it is a means by which fraudulent importers will escape the penalties which they ought to pay, by which the tax-payers of the country will be required to bear the burdens which these fraudulent importers ought to bear by paying their penalties; and it is suggested that this is so because if the question of the guilt or innocence of the importer is to be tried by a jury for the purpose of determining the question of forfeiture, he will never be found guilty of the actual intent to defraud. Now, sir, with all deference to the judgment of my eloquent friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] this is about the first time I have ever heard that the juries of the country may not be trusted to convict everybody who ought to be convicted where it helps them to pay the taxes.

Before pursuing the argument any further as to whether the subject is as safe in the jury-box as it is in the tribunals where the judgment is now required to be made, let me read the law as it now stands and see whether this provision is or is not open to the objections which are made to it. Where an importer or other person who is alleged to be liable to a forfeiture or to a penalty seeks to get rid of it, this is the provision under which he now acts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What statute does the Senator read from?

Mr. SCOTT. I read from the act of the 3d of March, 1797.

That whenever any person or persons, who shall have incurred any fine, penalty, forfeiture, or disability, or shall have been interested in any vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise which shall have been subject to any seizure, forfeiture, or disability by force of any present or future law of the United States for the laying, levying, or collecting any duties or taxes, or by force of any present or future act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels, or any act concerning the enrolling and licensing ships or vessels employed in the coasting trade or fisheries and for regulating the same, shall prefer his petition to the judge of the district in which such fine, penalty, forfeiture, or disability shall have accrued, truly and particularly setting forth the circumstances of his case, and shall pray that the same may be mitigated or remitted, the said judge shall inquire in a summary manner into the circumstances of the case, first causing reasonable notice to be given to the person or persons claiming such fine, penalty, or forfeiture and to the attorney of the United States for such district that each may have an opportunity of showing cause against the mitigation or remission thereof; and shall cause the facts which shall appear upon such inquiry to be stated and annexed to the petition and direct their transmission to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, who shall thereupon have power to mitigate or remit such fine, forfeiture, or penalty or remove such disability, or any part thereof, if in his opinion the same shall have been incurred without willful negligence or any intention of fraud in the person or persons incurring the same, and to direct the prosecution, if any shall have been instituted for the recovery thereof, to cease and be discontinued, upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and just.

Under that act, upon application to the judge of the district court, it becomes his duty to certify the facts to the Secretary of the Treasury, not simply to send the evidence as it is taken before him, but to find the facts and send them to the Secretary of the Treasury, and then if upon examination of the facts as certified to by the judge the Secretary of the Treasury shall be of opinion that there has been no such negligence or willful fraud as incurs the penalty, he may remit it. That is the law as it stands. So that the fraudulent importer now makes his application to a judge, and upon the preliminary hearing, upon a summary investigation before there has been a trial by jury in the court, that judge sends up the facts, and the question of whether the penalty is to be enforced or remitted rests in the judgment which the Secretary of the Treasury forms as to whether there was willful neglect or intentional fraud.

What does this amendment propose to do? Where a forfeiture of this kind is alleged to have been incurred, it provides that the question of whether that fraud which has incurred the forfeiture was done with intent to defraud shall be certified to and passed upon by the jury. It seems to me that this is an amendment in the right direction. We have heard in days that are past, and have heard something in recent days, of the importance to the citizen of trial by jury, before his life, his liberty, or his property shall be taken away. Here where his property is alleged to be forfeited, where he is alleged to be subject to a penalty, you give him the benefit of a trial by jury as to whether he has been willfully guilty of the act which it is alleged causes the forfeiture of his property or renders him subject to a penalty. Is that any hardship upon the citizen?

On the other hand, is it true that by resorting to such a tribunal fraudulent importers are more likely to escape than they are by such an examination as the one which I have read? There a petition is to be presented before the facts are fully developed, perhaps before they are all known to the district attorney, and upon a summary investigation the judge makes up the finding of the facts, and the Secretary of the Treasury, guided only by this finding, is to determine whether there was fraud or not.

I submit that you can safely trust this question to the juries in the United States courts. If it be true that these fines and penalties and forfeitures ought to go into the Treasury, ought to assist them in bearing the public burdens, the juries are just as likely to see that the fraudulent importer pays his penalties and relieves them from that much of the taxes as the judge is in finding the facts and the Secretary of the Treasury is in passing upon them. I can see no probable injury that is to result from this section. On the other hand, if there be an undervaluation such as some of those to which our attention has been recently called inserted by a mistake, such a mistake as for instance if a clerk should omit to put one pound and a few shillings of expenses upon an invoice, if that question is to be submitted to a jury, is not the importer as safe in being protected against a forfeiture by reason of a mistake as he will be after he has complied with these provisions in presenting his petition and having his case sent up to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator be good enough to explain what he means by that case to which he has just referred, where somebody was punished because a clerk had by accident omitted to add a pound of expenses to an invoice I suppose, although the Senator did not say so?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not remember whether anybody was punished in such a case; but I simply used it as an illustration. If an importer were to fail to put upon his invoice the expense of one pound and a few shillings, for instance, in transporting his goods from the place where they were purchased to the point at which they were shipped, or if his clerk in copying the invoice were to fail to put that on it, he would under the strict ruling of the law be liable to a penalty; and I simply used that as an illustration. I am not saying that the case has actually occurred, or that anybody has been punished for it.

Mr. HOWE. Does the Senator mean to say that the law actually exists which would subject the importer to a penalty under such circumstances?

Mr. SCOTT. My impression is that under the law as it now stands, if an invoice were made out showing that the value of the goods at a certain port was ten pounds, and it were to appear that one pound and four shillings had been paid in addition to the ten pounds for bringing them from the point where they were purchased to the point at which they were shipped, the omission of that one pound and four shillings would be an undervaluation in the eye of the law, and that invoice would be forfeited.

Mr. HOWE. The willful omission?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. Undoubtedly; but that is a very different case from what the Senator was stating.

Mr. SCOTT. I was simply stating the case as an illustration. If the question were now, was that a willful omission or was it a mistake? Would not that question be as likely to be determined properly by a jury as by a judge and by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. HOWE. Must it not be determined by a jury under the law as it stands, the question of knowledge or intent being a constituent of the offense of which the Senator was speaking?

Mr. SCOTT. I have been citing the act of 1797 under which the importer in such a case would apply to the Secretary of the Treasury to have the forfeiture remitted before a trial by jury.

Mr. HOWE. That is a distinct proceeding.

Mr. SCOTT. Very well. This is proposed to be substituted for it.

Mr. HOWE. But is it a substitute for that?

Mr. SCOTT. So I understand it.

Mr. HOWE. What is the language which makes it a substitution for it?

Mr. SCOTT. It is this:

That in all actions, suits, and proceedings in any court of the United States now pending or hereafter commenced or prosecuted to enforce or declare the forfeiture of any goods, wares, or merchandise, or to recover the value thereof, or any other sum alleged to be forfeited by reason of any violation of the provisions of the customs-revenue law, or any of such provisions, in which action, suit, or proceeding an issue or issues of fact shall have been joined—

Then the amendment goes on to provide—the court may, on its own motion, and shall, &c.—

submit these issues of fact to the jury. In the case which I have read, where a proceeding is instituted, before it is brought to trial, before it has been determined, the defendant, the party charged may present his petition and have this proceeding before the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOWE. Will not that provision survive the enactment of this? Is not this purely and solely a provision to direct the trial of a suit at law, and is not that a provision directing the manner in which an application shall be made to the Treasury to remit the consequences?

Mr. SCOTT. I can hardly concede that such will be the result, because if the application were to be made to the Secretary of the Treasury while the suit was pending and before the case has been tried, and he were to remit the forfeiture in advance, here stands a provision which requires this issue of fact to be submitted to a jury, and it can hardly be supposed that the penalty would be imposed and collected after it had been remitted by the Secretary of the Treasury. That has been my view of this provision, that it was intended to take the place of this application to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOWE. And to repeal that law?

Mr. SCOTT. And to repeal that law; and in that view of it, I have considered that this was no hardship whatever upon the importer and that there was no danger of the Government losing its revenues by it. If I have been mistaken in that it has been my mistake; it has not been considered in committee, whether it did repeal it or did not; but I certainly in looking at it have looked upon this amendment as a substitute for that act of 1797.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I hardly know whether to say I am in favor of this particular amendment or not at this stage of the debate. I am confused and bewildered in making up an opinion as to what is after all the real intent and purpose of this whole bill. If it is the purpose of this bill to make the collection of the revenues more certain and more complete, then I think the whole bill is a mistake. If it be, on the contrary, the purpose of the bill to make importing easy, the payment of duties optional with the importer, and to make rascality generally safe and secure, I cannot say but that the bill is pretty well contrived, and I do not see any reason for objecting to the particular amendment now pending.

I must confess that it does look to me as if every clause of this bill was contrived in aid of those who are not willing to pay duties, as if every clause of it was drawn for the express purpose of making the collection of duties difficult and uncertain. I see the title of the bill is simply "to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties." It is specific so far as one object is concerned, that is, to repeal moieties; quite general in respect to the other object named, to amend the customs-revenue laws. For nearly a century, the better part of a century, Congress has been laboring to so perfect its legislation as that the collection of your revenues should be made more and more certain year after year. Is it true that we are about to take a new departure, that the extraordinary powers of Congress are to be exerted now, not in behalf of the Government which seeks revenue, not in behalf of honest importers who are always willing to pay duties if their rivals in business will pay duties also, but to be exerted solely, expressly, and specifically in aid of those who have not paid duties and are not willing to pay them.

I find on my desk a pamphlet which is said to contain the evidence given before the Committee on Ways and Means relative to moieties and the customs-revenue laws. On the very first page of that pamphlet I find this extraordinary statement: A witness, who had been a special agent of the Treasury Department testified that he had been officially connected with the examination of fifty-nine cases of alleged frauds perpetrated by importing merchants on the revenues. Of those fifty-nine cases, one, after suit was commenced, was dismissed on the motion of the district attorney for reasons, as the witness said, not known to him. Another case was dismissed at his instance upon ascertaining that other parties had committed the fraud other than those against whom the suit was commenced; nine cases are still pending; forty-eight have terminated in judgments against the parties accused. That is the experience of one of your officials. Out of fifty-nine cases of alleged fraudulent practices on the part of importers forty-eight of them have terminated in judgments.

I do not know what instruction other Senators may draw from that piece of testimony. To me it suggests that instead of our trying to make the business of importing easier and the matter of avoiding payment of duties plainer, we want additional safeguards to it; and yet it seems to me, as I said before, that this bill in every clause of it has directly the opposite intent. Instead of drawing from that fact the lesson which it teaches me, that we want additional safeguards, here is a bill which proposes to muster out of service the whole class of officers to which this gentleman belongs, to dismiss them at once. Why? Has he detected too many frauds? He has detected a very large percentage, it must be admitted. Has he detected too many? Who complains? What wrong has been perpetrated under your laws as they stand against an honest importer? I ask these questions for information. I suppose the Finance Committee, if they really mean to make the checks less numerous than they already are, have discovered that innocence has suffered under the operations of existing laws, that innocent and honest merchants cannot protect themselves. If they have such testimony, it ought to be submitted to the Senate. I have not heard of it. I would be glad to know it.

Mr. President, touching this particular amendment, to which I suppose I ought to make some reference, I have only this so say: Every Senator must have noticed that this is to apply to cases now pending as well as to cases hereafter to be commenced. I take it there is not a suit pending anywhere in the United States, before any of its courts, in which this question of intent to defraud is not an element under the law as it stands. If it be a constituent of the offense charged under the law as it now stands, no matter what court tries the case, the court will tell the jury that an intent to defraud is of the gist of the offense, and that you cannot convict unless you find that intent. That is under the law as it stands, let the cause be tried in what court it may. Then in reference to those cases the addition of this language will be precisely what the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] pointed out a short time ago; that is, requiring the jury to find that an actual intent to defraud is something a little more than an intent to defraud, and not simply to find it in their general verdict, but to make a special finding of it independent of their general verdict. It must be only an attempt to bamboozle the jury in reference to that class of cases. It can have no other effect, it seems to me, possibly. But on the contrary, suppose this intent to defraud be not a constituent under the law as it stands of the offense charged in a suit now pending, then the effect of this clause is to introduce a brand-new constituent, a brand-new element, into a suit now pending. I do not think the Committee on Finance would insist upon that. I do not think they would consider it safe legislation in any case.

On the whole I think I shall vote against this amendment, let the general purpose of the bill be what it may. I think the bill will be better without the amendment than with it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It struck me that the criticism upon the word "actual" had some force, and I therefore move to strike it out. I do not think it changes the actual meaning of the amendment. I withdraw the motion for the present, as I understand another is to be offered.

Mr. WRIGHT. If it is the intention of the Senate to proceed with the consideration of this bill further, I desire to submit a few remarks on the question before it. If, however, the Senate prefers to adjourn at this time, I will yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was about to move to strike out the word "actual," but I thought the Senator wished to speak on this subject and perhaps offer an amendment, and therefore I withdrew that motion.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to understand what the purpose of the Senator from Ohio is; whether he proposes to sit this bill out this evening?

Mr. SHERMAN. O, yes; I hope the Senate will sit this bill out to-night, for the reason that to-morrow by unanimous consent a special order was made in behalf of bills from the Committee on Military Affairs, and then I suppose the financial bill reported to-day will naturally excite some discussion. Therefore to-day is the only chance I know of to dispose of this bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say a very few words on this amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. This matter will evidently lead to a very long discussion; and with the consent of the Senator from Iowa I will move that the Senate do now adjourn. The bill will take all night evidently.

Mr. WRIGHT. Inasmuch as I am opposed to adjourning, I cannot yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Senator from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. WRIGHT. In view of what I am satisfied is the anxiety of the committee to have a vote on this question, as I concur in what has been said by the chairman, who suggests the striking out of the word "actual," if we can do that by consent and get a vote at once, I shall not occupy time but give way to a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves to strike out the word "actual."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerical omission of the word "have," in the eighth line, will be supplied if there be no objection. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 24.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps it will expedite matters if I explain to the Senate now the state of this bill. There are three or four sections to which there are no amendments of any material importance, and then there is a long section reported as an amendment about the pay of collectors of customs. I have now the authority of the Committee on Finance to withdraw the whole of that amendment except so far as relates to the district of New York, the district of Boston, and the district of San Francisco, where the repeal of the moieties by the preceding part of the bill greatly affects the salaries, and where we have proposed somewhat to enlarge the salaries, leaving the salaries in all the other collection districts precisely as they are.

I make this statement in order to show that there is nothing in the bill now to increase salaries or add new officers, with the single exception I have stated of New York, San Francisco, and Boston, where by reason of the repeal of moieties the salaries have been so greatly reduced as to make them far below what anybody would believe to be a just compensation. In these districts we have provided for an increase of the salaries. Many thought the arrangement of salaries proposed was too large or too small or that one district was in that ought not to be in, and so on; and it is impossible in the condition we are in now for us to adjust the question of salaries as carefully as it ought to be done. Indeed I think the whole question of salaries of collectors and other officers of the customs ought to be referred to the Committee on Commerce and let them take up the whole matter. But so far as the districts of Boston, New York, and San Francisco are concerned, it is manifest that there must be an increase of the salaries in those districts. In New York the salary of the collector is but $4,000 a year, and he gets $44,000 in moieties. We repeal the moieties, and consequently leave him but $4,000 a year, which everybody knows is wholly inadequate for that port. So with Boston, and San Francisco in a less degree.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether the system of moieties has not been in operation a long time?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is aware that this bill does not affect materially the law as to smuggling; it does affect the law as to undervaluations. Most of these sections are to repeal laws passed during and since the war. For instance, all the laws which justify or authorize the seizure of books and papers were passed since 1863. They are repealed by this bill. So the laws authorizing moieties have been passed from time to time. The original acts authorizing moieties were passed at a time when the actual moieties were very small; but they were $2,000,000 last year.

Mr. STEWART. That is very true; but are we in a condition to try experiments? Is it a fact that men have become so much more honest now than formerly that the same inducements are not needed that were required originally in order to secure the collection of the revenue?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is hardly worth while at this hour to go into that question. I hope the Senator, if he wants instruction on that matter, will read the debate in the other House, and read the book of testimony which I see that the Senator from New York has before him.

Mr. STEWART. I am instructed sufficiently to say a word on this now. I think it is a very dangerous experiment. I think you had better increase your taxes.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think it is the wish of every Senator that we shall get along with this bill as rapidly as possible. I think perhaps there may be language in the second line of this section that if we would consent to strike out, the objection to the amendment of the committee would be withdrawn and thus expedite the passage of the bill. I move to strike out the words "now pending or."

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that. Then it will apply only to future cases.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then it would read:

In all actions, suits, and proceedings in any court of the United States hereafter commenced or prosecuted.

Mr. CONKLING. I think that would aid the section very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive the amendment of the Senator from Iowa if there be no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Finance to section [14] 16.

Mr. CHANDLER. In my judgment, Mr. President, the passage of this bill will cost the Treasury of the United States this year not less than $25,000,000 in coin. I was an unwilling convert to moieties. For years and years I opposed the whole system, but was forced upon a personal explanation to believe that without the system of moieties your revenues never could and never would be collected.

A great deal has been said about spies and informers. Will any man within the sound of my voice tell me how he will arrest a criminal anywhere without detectives and informers? Much has been said about discharged clerks revealing what has occurred in the counting-houses of their employers. Pray where else will you look except to men who have been discharged, or to your detectives, or to anybody else who has acquired this information and will yield it up for money? Sir, detectives are not as a class of the very highest order; and yet they are useful in their occupation, and without them the ends of justice cannot be attained. Without these moieties all along on the frontier—and it extends from the upper boundaries of Lake Superior clear down to the very lower end of the coast of Maine—you would find smuggling upon every rod of all that frontier.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will inform the Senator that this does not affect the law about smuggling and the forfeiture of one-half. The forfeiture of one-half is provided for in this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. The bill repeals all moieties, I understand; and I can inform the Senator from Ohio that nine-tenths, if not ninety-nine one-hundredths of all the seizures made on all that frontier are made by parties who receive their portion of the moieties sending spies into Canada; sending spies to look up the property that is to be sent across, and through the information thus obtained by spies paid by the very moieties that these men receive, the information is given that leads to nearly all the seizures.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me read the Senator this section:

SEC. 4. That whenever any officer of the customs or other person shall detect and seize goods, wares, or merchandise in the act of being smuggled, or which have been smuggled, he shall be entitled to such compensation therefor as the Secretary of the Treasury shall award, not exceeding in amount one-half of the net proceeds, if any, resulting from such seizure, after deducting all costs and charges connected therewith:

Mr. CONKLING. Now read the definition of smuggling.

Mr. SHERMAN. I read it yesterday, but I will read it again:

Provided, That for the purposes of this act smuggling shall be construed to mean the act, with intent to defraud, of bringing into the United States, or, with like intent, attempting to bring into the United States, dutiable articles without passing the same, or the package containing the same, through the customs-house, or submitting them to the officers of the revenue for examination.

I think it is a little clearer definition than the existing law. I think the Senator from Michigan exaggerates the effect of this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; I understand it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It operates mainly in cases of undervaluation; where fines, penalties, and moieties inured to the collector, naval officer, and surveyor.

Mr. CHANDLER. You allow the actual discoverer of the fraud a share not exceeding one-half, but it may be 1 per cent. or 2 per cent. or 5 per cent., he does not know how much, or whether it will be much or little. Therefore you take away the funds that have heretofore paid for sending spies across the border in advance and keeping them there to discover the smuggler in advance, and thus you destroy the efficiency of your service all along on that frontier.

Mr. President, the estimate of those well informed is that the Treasury loses $20,000,000 a year in coin from smuggling along that frontier alone, notwithstanding all the moieties you give. Now, if I had my way, particularly on that frontier and even in the cities of New York and Boston and the other great centers, rather than to destroy or even reduce these moieties, I would give the whole of them to the men who discover fraud, and let it be known that the smuggler will be detected in any event and that when detected he will be punished.

Mr. President, this bill has a wrong title. Its title should be "A bill to facilitate smuggling and to prevent fines, penalties, and forfeiture of the smuggler." That should be the title of this bill, a bill to deplete your Treasury, a bill to encourage dishonest men. Mr. President, I care not what laws you may enact, you will find the smuggler as sharp as the maker of your law. I care not what your penalty may be, you will find the smuggler sharp enough to dodge that penalty. Look at your safe manufacturers. I care not what combination of locks you may make for your safes, you will find a burglar smart enough to unlock a safe in less than a month after the new combination has been made. Rascals are not fools. Smugglers are not young innocents. They are the sharpest, shrewdest men on the face of this earth the world over. Go all around the coast of Great Britain; go around the coast of Spain, of France, of Germany, and you will find the sharpest and the shrewdest men there are the smugglers. Go into the city of New York and you will find the sharpest and the shrewdest and the most unscrupulous men there are the men engaged in smuggling.

Allusion was made some time ago, and the point was discussed as to the propriety of confiscating the whole invoice where an intentional fraud was perpetrated in that invoice, and the proposition to do that was voted down. In that connection my honorable friend from New York alluded to a certain fact, but did not elucidate it as he might have done. Now, the ordinary rule in the custom-houses at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and all the principal custom-houses in the United States is to examine indiscriminately one case in ten. They take an invoice, say of one hundred cases, or a thousand cases, and they set apart one case in ten indiscriminately and open that one case in ten and examine about one-fifth of that one case in ten. The number to be looked at is so perfectly enormous that it cannot be done, a thorough investigation cannot be made. The smuggler puts in his falsely invoiced goods into one case in five we will say. Suppose occasionally one of them is caught, he is making an enormous profit in any event.

The Senate has decided that it is a great hardship to punish this man who intentionally defrauds your Treasury. The Senate has decided that it will not exact a monetary penalty from the willing, determined smuggler. Now, for fear that there might be some other penalty than a monetary penalty this section provides that he shall suffer no other penalty. I will read the language:

The court may, on its own motion, and shall when requested so to do by either party, submit to the jury as a distinct and separate proposition, whether or not the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States.

Nine hundred and ninety-nine men out of a thousand among the smugglers will escape under that provision. You had better strike it out and say there shall be no penalty, and then you will have a better law and a more efficient law. Ninety-nine men out of a hundred ought to escape under that clause. The fraud is perpetrated by a clerk nine times out of ten. A man is hired by a large mercantile importing house to reside on the other side of the Atlantic and he perpetrates the fraud. He will send a false invoice to-day, and by the next steamer he will send to some junior partner or some clerk in the importing house here another and a true invoice which may never reach the principal of that importing concern. Hence when you bring him up for trial and punishment under the law with intent to defraud the Treasury of the United States, he can truthfully say that he knew nothing whatever about it. He may have suspected that frauds were going on from day to day; he may have known that these frauds were enormous; he may have known that he had driven every honorable merchant out of that branch of the importing trade; but he would be acquitted. Nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand of the smugglers in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore would be acquitted under that clause that you now propose to enact.

But, Mr. President, as it has been decided that smuggling is no crime, I see no reason why the amendment should not prevail and allow the smugglers to go free.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is in section [14] 16, to strike out:

It shall be the duty of the court, on the trial thereof, to submit to the jury, as a distinct and separate proposition, whether the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States, and to require upon such proposition a special finding by such jury; or, if such issues be tried by the court without a jury, it shall be the duty of the court to pass upon and decide such proposition as a distinct and separate finding of fact; and in such cases, unless intent to defraud shall be so found, penalty or forfeiture shall be imposed.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

The court may, on its own motion, and shall, when requested so to do by either party, submit to the jury, as a distinct and separate proposition, whether or not the alleged acts were done with an intention to defraud the United States, or may submit any other specific interrogatory material to a determination of the issue or issues joined, and require special findings thereon by the jury; or if such issues be tried by the court without a jury, it shall be the duty of the court, when requested so to do by either party, to find the facts, and enter the same as a part of the record.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the hour is very late and the Senate is very hot; I think altogether too soft to resist a proposition even if it is a bad one. I do not think the Committee on Finance ought to insist upon passing this bill to-night.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is any objection to this section, and if the Senate desires to strike it out, I have no objection to its going out. It is nothing in the world except to provide in certain cases for a special rather than a general verdict. That is all there is in the section, and if Senators want to strike it out, let it go.

Mr. HOWE. Had we not better do that considerately to-morrow? I move that the Senate adjourn, (at five o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.)

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope not.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. To expedite the matter, I move to strike out section 16 of the present print, section 14 of the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive that motion if there be no objection. The question is on the motion to strike out the section.

The motion was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section [16] 18, line 6, after the word "transmitted," to strike out "without cost or expense to the petitioner;" so that the section will read:

SEC. [16] 18. That the summary investigation hereby provided for may be held before the judge to whom the petition is presented, or, if he shall so direct, before any United States commissioner for such district, and the facts appearing thereon shall be stated and annexed to the petition, and, together with a certified copy of the evidence, transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section [17] 19 was read. The Committee on Finance proposed to amend this section in line 1, by inserting after the word "officer" the words "or officers," and striking out in line 2 "customs, special agent, or district attorney," and inserting "the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will read the section as it would stand if amended as proposed by the committee, and it will be submitted as one question.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee propose to amend the section so that if amended it will read:

SEC. [17] 19. That it shall not be lawful for any officer or officers of the United States to compromise or abate any claim of the United States arising under the customs laws, for any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred by a violation thereof; and any officer or person who shall so compromise or abate any such claim, or attempt to make such compromise or abatement, or in any manner relieve, or attempt to relieve, from such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall suffer imprisonment not exceeding ten years and be fined not exceeding $10,000: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with general regulations, to be prescribed by him, not in conflict with existing laws nor with the provisions of this act, may remit any fines, penalties, or forfeitures, upon sufficient proof that there was no fraudulent intention or willful neglect upon the part of such person or persons against whom such fines, penalties, or forfeitures shall have accrued, or on the part of his or their agent or agents.

Mr. CONKLING. Reluctant as I am to occupy a moment I will call attention to one result of this section which I think the committee does not mean, and I do it because the district attorney of a district quite distant from here has called my attention to one case especially to illustrate it, being a case of fraud, a case in which the penalty could never be collected from the party, but one in which he and those aiding him would be quite willing to pay a part in order to be exonerated and go on in business. It will be observed that this section takes away the power of escaping any portion of the penalty except in cases where there is no fraud; and, without dwelling upon it, the Senate will see that it prevents the Secretary of the Treasury in every case from saying to a man, "Now you cannot pay this penalty, but if you or your friends will pay 25 or 50 per cent. or 75 or whatever it may be you shall be released." It prevents an arrangement of that sort so common in all the affairs of life and especially so in these cases.

As I say, my attention has been called to one case in which the penalty I think is some $40,000, and it is utterly idle, as the district attorney writes to me, to attempt to collect it; but if there were power in the Secretary of the Treasury or anybody else to compromise it upon the party paying one-half or whatever the percentage might be, he could do it; but it does not fall within this section because it is a case of confessed fraud.

Mr. SHERMAN. This power in the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and compromise all cases in pursuance of general regulations is limited only to cases where there is no fraudulent intent or willful neglect. Whether it is wise to give the Secretary of the Treasury power to compound cases of actual crime and fraud is a question for the Senate to determine. The committee finding this section here left it in the bill and simply changed the words. I am not sure but that it would be well enough to leave to the Secretary of the Treasury full power to compromise all cases; but this is an amendment in the other direction, and I would ask the opinion of the gentleman who has acted as Secretary of the Treasury, would he have under the existing law compromised a case where there was a clear fraudulent intent or where there was an admitted neglect of duty?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. This therefore does not change the practice of the Department. Whether it changes the law or not, I do not know. The Secretary is authorized here to compound and compromise all cases except these two.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should be opposed to the section. I think it is wrong in both its parts. The first part is unnecessary, and the second part of the section is very unwise. The Secretary has the power now to settle all matters of penalty where there is evidence satisfactory to the judge of the court trying the case and the Secretary that there was no intentional fraud, and you have provided in this bill already in the two preceding sections in the same direction. It seems to me the proviso of this section is wholly unnecessary and unwise. If it is designed to extend to the relief of parties from criminal proceedings, it is eminently unwise that any such power should be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think myself the Secretary would never undertake to settle and compound a case of clear fraud.

Mr. CONKLING. But why should he not? Take the case I have here in a letter where a man is liable to $40,000 penalty which he cannot pay and which never can be collected.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is provided for in the preceding section the Senator will see. The Secretary is authorized to mitigate the payment of a fine, penalty, or forfeiture, or remove a disability.

Mr. CONKLING. Where does the Senator find that?

Mr. SHERMAN. In the preceding section, page 13, where the Secretary is authorized on a summary investigation—

To mitigate or remit such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, or remove such disability, or any part thereof, if, in his opinion, the same shall have been incurred without willful negligence or any intention of fraud in the person or persons incurring the same, and to direct the prosecution, if any shall have been instituted for the recovery thereof, to cease and be discontinued upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and just.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the very point to which I call attention. Here is a case, to which I refer him, of confessed fraud, where the penalty is $40,000; it cannot be collected; but if anybody has power this man confessing his fraud, to accept $5,000 or $10,000, that he says he can raise and pay. I say that these two sections as I read them take away from the court, from the Secretary of the Treasury, and from anybody else, the power to do that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Except the President.

Mr. CONKLING. By way of pardon, the Senator means?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. But that applies to a criminal case. The case I am speaking of to my friend is one in rem, where goods have been seized as smuggled goods; there is a penalty incurred in consequence of the seizure, and the penalty far exceeds the amount of the value of the goods which have been seized, so that the personal ability of the owner is the only thing to which the Government can look. Now, this prosecuting officer says to me that he has the very case before him where the Government can take, as he is assured, $5,000 or $10,000, if there were anybody who has power to do it; but if this section passes, nobody, not even the President of the United States, can do it; for it is not a case for pardon, or for anything which falls within his province.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, so far as the power of the Secretary of the Treasury is concerned, it seems to me that these nineteenth and twentieth sections are wholly unnecessary, because the act of 1797 already provides the mode by which a person who has been subjected to fine, forfeiture, or the like may obtain a remission by a petition to the judge of the proper district, a hearing before him, and a certification of the evidence by him to the Secretary of the Treasury who is authorized to remit where in his opinion there has been no willful negligence or intention to defraud the Government.

The insertion of these sections looks as if there was to be some independent application to the Secretary of the Treasury without going through the mode provided by the act of 1797. I think that those sections therefore had better go out, and if the Senator from New York thinks that the power to compromise in cases of admitted fraud ought to exist in order that we may get the most money we can under the circumstances, that will present a distinct and independent proposition, about which there might well be very different opinions. On the one side the Government might save some money by such a provision as that; in other words, by having exactly the power an individual has of compromising with his fraudulent debtor; on the other hand it is a tremendous power to place in the hands of one man who superintends the collection of $200,000,000 a year to say that he may remit, whenever he sees fit in order to obtain money from a fraudulent debtor, all the rest of a debt which he thinks he cannot obtain. It is a very dangerous power indeed—a tremendous power to place in the hands of a single man. I do not know without reflection how I should vote upon that proposition if it were here; but I think if it is to be here at all, it had better be offered as a distinct proposition; and that to clear this bill of what is wholly unnecessary, the nineteenth and twentieth sections had better be stricken out. Why should the twentieth section be retained? The twentieth section as renumbered, not the twentieth original section, (I use the numbers of the new print,) provides:

That whenever any application shall be made to the Secretary of the Treasury for the mitigation or remission of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, or the refund of any duties, in case the amount involved is not less than $1,000, the applicant shall notify the district attorney and collector of customs of the district in which the duties, fine, penalty, or forfeiture accrued; and it shall be the duty of such collector and district attorney to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury all practicable information necessary to enable him to protect the interests of the United States.

With the exception of this refunding of duties, the district attorney has already been notified to appear before the judge, and the judge has found the facts, and certified them and the testimony to the Secretary of the Treasury. Why, therefore, summon him and the collector again?

Mr. BOUTWELL. As far as I understand these two sections, the first is unwise and the second is unnecessary. The power the exercise of which is directed by the twentieth section exists at the present time. I do not think a party charged has ever been relieved by the Secretary of the Treasury except the subject-matter had been under the cognizance of the district attorney or the attorney of the United States charged with the management of the case; and the twentieth section merely re-enacts that practice, and I believe the practice depends upon statute now.

As regards the nineteenth section of the new numbering, it will be seen, as I think, that the committee of the Senate have changed entirely the original purpose of the first part of this section. As it came from the House it evidently was aimed at what was supposed to be a practice, but which I believe never was a practice, of subordinate officers making compromises or settlements on their own account and by their own judgment, without the case being reported to the Treasury Department and acted upon in the ordinary way. If you look at the text of the bill as it came from the House, it was evidently the intention of the committee that framed the bill to put an end to that practice, which of course would be necessary if any such practice had ever existed. But now the amendments proposed by the Finance Committee of the Senate deprive all the officers of the Treasury Department, from the Secretary down, of the power to adjust any of these claims, and then the proviso comes in and authorizes the adjustment by the Secretary of the Treasury where no fraudulent intention is shown to exist.

Now, as regards the first part of this section, the object aimed at by the committee of the House being wholly unnecessary, no such practice existing, I submit that so much of this section ought to be rejected by the Senate. And then as regards the latter part, the proviso, there is a way under this statute, there is a way under the statute of 1797 of reaching the same result with steps of caution through the court, which are not contained in this proviso; and therefore the existing law for the purpose of practical administration is much better than the statute would be if this proviso were enacted.

As regards the settlement of claims arising out of admitted frauds on the Government, there is no statute authorizing the settlement of such claims unless it be a section found in an internal-revenue law passed in 1863 which was construed by several Secretaries of the Treasury previous to the time that I occupied the position to authorize the settlement of every claim by the Government which could be adjusted by pecuniary compensation. I am not aware that any case of actual fraud ever was so adjusted; but I believe the interpretation given by Mr. Chase and Mr. Fessenden and Mr. McCulloch to the law would authorize the settlement of such a case if it appeared that the party was not able to respond to the amount for which he had been mulcted in full; that is, part of it might be taken if the party were bankrupt or unable to respond in full to the amount for which he was justly liable.

Mr. CONOVER. It is now after six o'clock, and it must be plain to every one that this bill cannot be concluded to-night.

Mr. SHERMAN. Fifteen minutes will do it, I think.

Mr. CONOVER. There are several points in the bill yet to be considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know; but they will not take long. If the Senator from Florida will give way, on the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts, if he thinks these two sections are unnecessary he can move to strike out the nineteenth and twentieth sections.

Mr. CONOVER. I was going to move, and do move, that the Senate now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Now, if it is in order I will move to strike out the nineteenth and twentieth sections of the bill as reported, being the seventeenth and eighteenth sections of the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive that motion if there is no objection. The question is on the motion to strike out.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill, and read section [19] 21, as follows:

SEC. [19] 21. That whenever any goods, wares, and merchandise shall have been entered and passed free of duty, and whenever duties upon any imported goods, wares, and merchandise shall have been liquidated and paid, and such goods, wares, and merchandise shall have been delivered to the owner, importer, agent, or consignee, such entry and passage free of duty and such settlement of duties shall, in the absence of fraud and in the absence of protest by the owner, importer, agent, or consignee, be final and conclusive upon all parties.

Mr. CONKLING. I inquire of one of the Senators having charge of the bill, whose fraud is referred to in this section?

Mr. SHERMAN. Any fraud. "In the absence of fraud, and in the absence of protest by the owner, importer, agent, or consignee," is the language. If the Senator can make it more definite I shall be very glad to have him do so.

Mr. CONKLING. I think it means, and I think my friend will agree with me if he turns back to page 3, that it can mean no fraud except that of the importer, the consignee, the person on this side, whatever may be the fraud of the consignor on the other side, and when a liquidation has once occurred, that is final and conclusive upon all parties. The Senator doubtless knows as well as I do that at the port of New York, perhaps more than anywhere else, owing to the great amount of business, liquidations are made very rapidly, summarily, and it occurs in very many cases that errors are made and importers come voluntarily afterward, and tender the duties which were unpaid, finding the mistake themselves. Under this section and under previous sections, I understand it would be a crime for a collector to receive a voluntary payment in that case. Then when you come to all the instances of fraud discovered in the consignor where the invoice was made on the other side and the fraud there took place, the liquidation is quickly made and passed through the custom-houses, and the Government is forever estopped from readjusting the liquidation. I submit to the Senator from Ohio that the section ought to be changed either by striking out "in the absence of fraud" or in some other mode which will effect the object.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is perfectly manifest that this section is intended to prevent stale claims from being made against persons who have imported goods free of duty or who have imported good and paid the duties in good faith, everybody supposing the settlement was right, and afterward it should turn out by accident or design that too little was collected or some mistake made. This excludes from the benefit of the section every case of fraud.

Mr. CONKLING. Suppose you say "in the absence of fraud, whether of the consignee, or the consignor, or their agents." If I go through the custom-house, however innocent, and it turns out afterward that I have paid but a small part of the duties chargeable to me, I do not see why, when the officers come to write up their accounts, they should not be permitted to send around to my office and say, "An error occurred in liquidation yesterday, and you owe the custom-house fifty dollars," and why I should not pay it. If this section is to be enforced and care is to be taken, the Senator will see that it will make very slow, very careful, very circumspect this process which now it is all-important to importers to have promptly done, with the understanding all around that if an error occurs attention is to be called to that and it is to be adjusted afterward. Under this section, however, every man must go upon his peril; he must know that he commits the Government absolutely and never can call upon it afterward, or under a previous section that he cannot even receive it, without committing a misdemeanor if a voluntary tender of it is made. I would strike out "fraud" altogether, or, if I retained it, I would put in words that would apply to both sides and the agents of both sides.

Mr. SHERMAN. Strike out "in the absence of fraud," and we can examine it more fully.

Mr. SARGENT. Then you make it final and conclusive whether there is fraud or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me the section is right now. It simply prevents a man who has paid honestly and fairly, in the absence of fraud, from being bothered and harassed afterward.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Should there not be, as in some other cases, some time fixed, say after the expiration of six years? Of course there should be an end to proceedings, either civil or criminal, in these cases, but that it should be immediate on the delivery of the goods seems to me in the highest degree improper and unadvisable.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would make this suggestion, "after a period of one year."

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think that is rather short. Three years is the statute of limitations on crimes. One year is too short a time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Insert after the words "settlement of duties" the words "after the expiration of one year."

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should prefer to say "three years."

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I will say "after the expiration of three years."

Mr. CONKLING. I think that improves it very much.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to insert the words "after the expiration of three years from the time of entry" after the word "shall" in the seventh line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be continued.

The Chief Clerk read section [20] 22. The Committee on Finance proposed to amend the section by striking out in line 6, after the words "time of," the words "any legal disability of the person, or his;" in line 7, before the word "absence," by inserting the word "the;" in the same line, after the words "United States," by inserting the words "of the person subject to such penalty or forfeiture;" so that the section will read:

SEC. [20] 22. That no suit or action to recover any pecuniary penalty or forfeiture of property accruing under the customs-revenue laws of the United States shall be maintained unless such suit or action shall be commenced within two years after the time when such penalty or forfeiture shall have accrued: Provided, That the time of the absence from the United States of the person subject to such penalty or forfeiture, or of any concealment or absence of the property, shall not be reckoned within this period of limitation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. What is the limitation now on these prosecutions?

Mr. CONKLING. Six years.

Mr. SCOTT. I think "two" should be stricken out and "three" inserted, to correspond with the limitation fixed by the previous section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada make a motion?

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator from Nevada does not make any motion, I move that "two" be stricken out and "three" inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I think that improves the section, but I beg to call attention to two or three things in regard to it. I understand the effect of the amendment in line 6 is that the statute shall run during legal disability. Why should the statute run if in the mean time there is no power to proceed?

Mr. THURMAN. What is legal disability of the defendant?

Mr. SCOTT. That is stricken out.

Mr. CONKLING. It will read then:

Provided, That the time of absence from the United States of the person subject to such penalty or forfeiture, or of any concealment or absence of the property, shall not be reckoned within this period of limitation.

The effect would be not to include the period of disability. I am inclined to think that the Senators are right, and I wrong as to that; but I venture to call attention to another matter here. I see the provision is that no suit or action shall be "maintained." Was that word chosen to apply to existing actions? If not, I suggest that the provision should be as it is stereotyped in all the statutes of limitation that I know of, that "no proceeding shall be hereafter commenced," or words to that effect. There may be many cases pending now where it will turn out on the trial that the action was not commenced until more than three years after the original act was done. I presume it is not the intent to cut up those actions by the roots; and yet the use of the word "maintained," I submit to the Senators for their consideration, would have that effect.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from New York will see that the phraseology is certainly not intended to apply to pending suits, for the reason that the future tense is used in connection with the first part of the section: "Shall be maintained unless such suit or action shall be commenced."

Mr. CONKLING. Why not change the word "maintained?" I think it is open to objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Say "which have been commenced."

Mr. SCOTT. If it read "shall have been commenced" it would have been open to the criticism made.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Ohio having no objection I move that "maintained" be stricken out and "instituted" inserted in lieu of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to receiving this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, in regard to the next two sections reported as amendments, I propose to strike out the great body of them, and the Clerk will note the changes I propose. From line 1 to the end of line 13 of section 23, as reported, provide for the salaries of the collectors at New York, Boston, and San Francisco. I leave in all of section 23 down to line 13, so as to provide for the salary of the collector of the district of New York at $12,000, and collectors of the district of Boston and San Francisco each at $8,000. Then I stike out commencing in line 14 down to and including line 68. Then I leave in lines 69 to 73, providing for the naval officer for the district of New York, for the naval officer of the district of Boston, and for the naval officer for the district of San Francisco.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator will allow me to suggest that lines 77, 78, and 79 should come, out as applicable to officers who belong to the districts he has already stricken out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose to strike out all from lines 74 to 79.

Mr. HAMLIN. All right.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I leave in lines 80 to 83, which provide for the surveyors of the ports of New York, Boston, and San Francisco, and I strike out from line 84 to 86. Then I leave in from line 87 down to the bottom of that page and to line 110 on the next page. That clause provides for the subordinate officers at the port of New York. Then I strike out from line 111 to 122, and I leave in from line 123 to line 132. That applies to subordinate officers for the district of New York. Then I strike out from line 133 down to and including the word "Department," in line 136; so that that clause will read:

And the annual compensation of other collectors, surveyors, and other officers and employés connected with the customs service not named herein—shall continue as fixed by existing laws.

And here I insert the words "and not herein otherwise provided for"—

Then strike out the whole of section 24 as reported.

I will state again that the object of these sections originally was not to increase any salary, but simply to provide for the case of the repeal of moieties. Finding such a diversity of opinion among Senators as to the respective grade and importance of their respective ports, a difference that was utterly impossible to reconcile—some wishing to base compensation on one basis and some on another—we propose to leave that so that the Committee on Commerce can at their leisure look carefully over the whole subject; and we simply provide for the three great ports of New York, Boston, and San Francisco, which will suffer most by the passage of this bill repealing moieties.

Mr. CONKLING. Will it be agreeable to the Senator for me to direct his attention to two matters now?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask him to look on page 15 at the bottom of the page, at line 4 of section 23. What does he propose to do with that?

And other officers or employés connected with the customs service.

Mr. SHERMAN. That language is necessary because there are other officers and employés included, as for instance on page 19 quite a number of clerks, samplers, measurers, &c., in the city of New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I wish the Senator to turn to page 20, and there I call attention to what I think is a contradiction in the bill. In the first place at the bottom of page 19 he will find these words:

And that all supplies shall be furnished by the collector on monthly estimates submitted by the appraiser to the Secretary of the Treasury, and approved by him.

There the collector is to act, and he is liable on his bond. Now proceeding:

And all repairs and alterations needed in the public store and appraiser's department at said port of New York shall be made on the recommendation of the appraiser in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct.

There the collector has nothing to do with it, and yet he is responsible all the time on his bond. I presume there is no reason for that, and I think there are strong reasons against it. Therefore I suggest to the Senator to insert the same words that he employs a few lines before.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a matter I am not advised about.

Mr. SARGENT. The collector would not be responsible on his bond for repairs and alterations in the appraiser's store if he had nothing to do with them.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir; there is no doubt about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seemed to be right that the appraiser should have charge of the alterations in the public stores.

Mr. CONKLING. Then why not put the other case on the same principle?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I would suggest this language: "and all repairs and alterations needed in the public store and appraiser's department at said port of New York, shall be made in like manner," and then strike out in line 109 all after "appraiser;" so as to read:

And all repairs and alterations needed in the public store and appraiser's department at said port of New York shall be made in like manner on the recommendation of the appraiser.

That will strike out the words "in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended at the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CONKLING. Does that include the twenty-fourth section?

Mr. SHERMAN. The striking out of that section is included in my amendment, so that there is no salary increased except in the three cases named.

The amendment was agreed to, being to insert the following:

SEC. 23. That in lieu of the salaries, moieties, and perquisites of whatever name or nature, and commissions on disbursements, now paid to and received by the collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and other officers and employés connected with the customs service in the several collection districts of the United States hereinafter named, there shall be paid, from and after the 1st day of July, 1874, an annual salary as follows:

To the collector of the district of New York, $12,000.

To the collectors of the districts of Boston and Charlestown, Massachusetts, and San Francisco, California, each $8,000.

To the naval officer for the district of New York, $8,000.

To the naval officers of the districts of Boston and Charlestown, Massachusetts, and San Francisco, California, each $5,000.

To the surveyor of the port of New York, $8,000.

To the surveyors of the ports of Boston, Massachusetts, and San Francisco, California, each $5,000.

To the appraiser and other officers and employés in his department in the port of New York, as follows:

To the appraiser, $8,000.

To the assistant appraisers, each $4,000.

To the examiners, each not to exceed $3,000.

To the clerks who may be designated chief clerks, each not to exceed $2,500.

To clerks, verifiers, and samplers, each not to exceed $2,500.

To messengers, each $900.

To openers and packers, each three dollars per diem.

The collector at New York shall detail a store-keeper and such number of clerks and other employés as may, by the Secretary of the Treasury, be deemed necessary to perform the duty of receiving packages designated for examination at the public stores, and of delivering the same after examination therefrom; and that all supplies shall be furnished by the collector on monthly estimates submitted by the appraiser to the Secretary of the Treasury, and approved by him; and all repairs and alterations needed in the public store and appraiser's department at said port of New York shall be made in like manner on the recommendation of the appraiser.

There shall be paid to the subordinate officers of the district of New York:

To the assistant collector, $5,000 per annum.

To the deputy collectors, each $4,000 per annum.

To the chief clerk of each division under a deputy collector, $2,500 per annum.

To the entry and liquidating clerks in the office of the collector of customs, each not to exceed $2,500 per annum.

And the annual compensation of other collectors, surveyors, and other officers and employés connected with the customs service not named herein, and not herein otherwise provided for, shall continue as fixed by existing law.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio how much of the twenty-third section was included in his motion to strike out?

Mr. SHERMAN. The great body of it. Everything is stricken out except what relates to the ports of New York, San Francisco, and Boston.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was read, being to insert as section 25 the following:

That at the several ports of the United States where there are collectors, naval officers, surveyors, or appraisers, the subordinate officers and employés shall be appointed on the approval and at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the nomination of the officer to whose office such subordinate officer or employé properly belongs.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senator from Ohio if it is wise to retain that section? You have by it a divided force; you have a force with no head to it. It is changing the entire practice of the Government. It seems to me the collector, who is the responsible officer, should be responsible for all these things; and that he should be the person, as he has been in all time, to make the nominations, and the Secretary of the Treasury to confirm them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there has been more complaint to us on this subject than almost any other. For instance, the naval officer and surveyor have many employés in their departments; and there is always more or less feeling between the officers on this account. Each head of a bureau in a great custom-house like that of New York feels that he ought to name his own subordinates, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think there would be just as much propriety in saying that the Assistant Secretaries of the various Departments here should have the authority of appointing the subordinates of the Departments; or you might carry it a step further and say the head of each Bureau should select his own appointees, and not the head of the Department, to wit, the Secretary. It is changing the whole practice. It will produce confusion. It can do no possible good. The section ought not to be here. It should be stricken out.

Mr. CONKLING. I think it should be stricken out. I have never heard of any such jealousy between these officers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly indifferent about it.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to strike out the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee is to insert the section.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONKLING. Now the section is stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes. The next amendment will be read.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert the following as section 26:

That all fees, storage, or other moneys heretofore applicable to the compensation or emoluments of officers of the customs shall be paid into the Treasury, and return thereof shall be made to the accounting officers of the Treasury under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and all expenses of collecting the revenue from customs shall be defrayed from the appropriation of that name, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HAMLIN. That section should be stricken out. When the whole bill was here there was a propriety in having this section in, but nearly all the collection districts affected by this amendment have been stricken out of the twenty-third section, and the collectors derive a portion of their fees by which their compensation is made up from storage, and this section, unless all that was in the bill as reported be retained, should also come out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think it should.

Mr. SHERMAN. I presume some of these fees enter into the compensation of collectors.

Mr. HAMLIN. They do; and where they get their little sums it helps them out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose it is necessary to strike out that section; the fees form a part of the compensation of these collectors.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to strike it out. It should not be there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on inserting the section reported as an amendment by the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was to insert the following as section 27:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, from time to time, make such regulations as he may deem necessary for the conduct and management of the bonded warehouses, general-order stores, and other depositories of the imported merchandise throughout the United States; all regulations or orders issued by collectors of customs in regard thereto shall be subject to revision, alteration, or revocation by him; and no warehouse shall be bonded and no general-order store established without his authority and approval. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, in granting permits to establish general-order warehouses, to require such warehouse or warehouses to be located contiguous, or as near as may be, to the landing-places of steamers and vessels from foreign ports; and that no officer of the customs shall have any personal ownership of or interest in any bonded warehouse or general-order store.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as section 28:

That public cartage of merchandise in the custody of the Government shall be subject to the regulations and approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as section 29:

That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed; that nothing herein contained shall affect existing rights, or prevent a distribution, in like manner as if this act had not been passed, in all cases where prosecution has been actually commenced.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I have received to day a telegram from the president of the board of trade of Boston and quite a number of telegrams from the city of New York from persons interested in this matter, suggesting that the last clause of this section is very objectionable in that it permits a certain distribution of moieties. I move to strike out that part of the section commencing in the second line with the word "that" down to the end.

Mr. CONKLING. It is in order to perfect the text before a motion is put to strike it out, I believe?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CONKLING. The telegrams to which the Senator has referred, although I know not from whom they come, let a large ray of light fall on this whole subject. I have heard it said a great many times that if this bill were not to apply to pending actions, much of the interest felt in it would disappear. I have been reluctant to believe the implication of that; but certainly any man who wants now to change the law as to pending suits opens his suggestion to a good deal of comment. I move to add to the section as it stands these words: "or in anywise affect suits or actions already commenced, or forfeitures already incurred;" my motive being only to make sure of the effect of the language as it is proposed by the committee, to the end that the statute of limitations which we have adopted and various other things in the bill may not be construed to apply at all to actions now pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I think I ought to say that there is no objection to this. I showed it to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I think there is no objection to it.

The question being put on the amendment of Mr. CONKLING, the Chair declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. I want to say one word on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York. As I understand it, a man might have committed the offense five years and eleven months ago, and in one month more the present statute, at the end of six years, would bar any prosecution; and now it is to be extended according to the effect of the amendment for three years more.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me, not at all. If the Senator turns back to the section to which he refers, he will find that it is to be three years from the time when the penalty was incurred. In such a case the Senator will see it would be barred already in two years more.

Mr. THURMAN. But if the Senator's amendment is that nothing in this act contained shall apply to any forfeiture already incurred or penalty already incurred——

Mr. CONKLING. Then it leaves it on the statute as it is?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. Precisely; that is just what I say it should do.

Mr. WASHBURN. I wish before voting on this amendment to say a word. I do not care very much about the fate of the amendment which the Senator from New York has offered; but if the text was amended in the last line so as to read "prosecutions which were actually commenced before January 1, 1874," I do not know that I should have any objection to it. So far as the protection of the Government is concerned, we want to do what we can to protect the Government. So far as any suits were commenced before this question was taken up in the other branch, and it was understood by persons who were to receive moieties that there was a prospect of this bill passing, I do not object to all those cases being retained; but I wish the Senate to understand that very many cases were entered for proceedings to be had without any knowledge in regard to them in order to save those cases from the operation of this bill. Very many of them have been entered within the last week or two very much in the same manner as the beneficiary of the Sanborn contract, as it was alleged, presented a list of different railroads over the country, so that if any case should be found against any of them it would be covered and controlled by his contract. It seems to me that if all the cases which were commenced previous to the inception of this legislation are excepted, it is sufficient. In other words, it should not be the desire of the Senate to encourage the very parties whom you propose to strike off by this bill in entering suits in order that they might make all the difficulty that was in their power after this legislation commenced.

Mr. CONKLING. Pardon me. Will it meet the Senator's view if I change my amendment so as to read thus: "or in anywise affect suits or actions commenced, or forfeitures incurred prior to May 1, 1874?" I take that date at the suggestion of another Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. That goes back before the passage of the bill in the House.

Mr. CONKLING. And unless the purpose really be to cut off valid suits, I submit to the Senate that that covers the whole ground.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from New York will be modified as he suggests.

Mr. CONKLING. Strike out "already" in both cases and add "previous to May 1, 1874," so as to read "or actions commenced or forfeitures incurred previous to May 1, 1874."

Mr. SCOTT. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will accept that suggestion of the Senator from New York, for this reason: There are some causes of forfeiture which we have cut up by this bill; and my information is that in several quarters—I will not specify where—since it was apprehended that this bill would pass, very recent suits have been instituted to save cases of that character, which perhaps would not have been instituted had not this apprehension arisen. I think the suggestion of the Senator from New York is an entirely proper one, and I hope it will be accepted. It goes back far enough.

Mr. WASHBURN. I do not know that there were any cases commenced between January and May. I know that very many cases have been entered since this bill was reported to the Senate. I think it cannot be the desire of any one to encourage that kind of practice.

Mr. SHERMAN. May the 1st is long before the bill passed the House.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to inquire of my friend from Pennsylvania whether he has information that any such recent suits have been commenced in the State of New York?

Mr. SCOTT. No; I have not any information that any have been commenced in the State of New York. I had information, and the Senator from Massachusetts seems to corroborate it, that a number have been recently commenced in the city of Boston.

Mr. CONKLING. I had heard this rumor and I asked the question because I have taken pains to inquire in respect of the port of New York, and I am advised that there is no instance of any recent suit commenced which would fall within the description to which these Senators have referred.

Mr. HOWE. This information strikes me as very interesting. Are we really assured that in the city of Boston a suit has been commenced to recover a penalty or a fine to the United States after distinct notice was given that Congress did not mean to have fines and penalties collected at all? Is that the information? If that be so, are you doing your whole duty to the morals of the United States in simply saying that such a suit shall not be prosecuted to judgment? Ought you not to provide some penalties upon such a miscreant as one who should bring such a suit? I am a little overcome by this information.

Mr. WASHBURN. In order that there may be no misunderstanding I will say that I know nothing about suits in Boston or New York. I merely know that there are such rumors in regard to New York as well as Boston. I do not know that there is any foundation for them in either case. I only wish to have the amendment so that if any such attempts have been made the persons making them shall not profit by them.

Mr. THURMAN. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as modified, is to insert at the end of the section:

Or in anywise affect suits or actions commenced or forfeiture incurred previous to May 1, 1874.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon this amendment the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 27, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Logan, Mitchell, Oglesby, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Thurman, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Buckingham, Cooper, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Stockton, and Wadleigh—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Robertson, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, and West—31.

So the amendment of Mr. CONKLING was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. My motion is to strike out the amendment as perfected.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on this motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. May we know what the amendment is?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is that of the Senator from Connecticut to strike out the whole section after the word "repeal" in line 2.

Mr. CONKLING. So as to have it act on all existing cases.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 18, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Buckingham, Cooper, Davis, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Stockton, and Thurman—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Boutwell, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Logan, Mitchell, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Wadleigh, Washburn, and Windom—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Robertson, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, West, and Wright—33.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee, as amended, inserting the section.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move to insert after the words "existing rights" the words "of the United States," and to strike out all thereafter in that section.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have had a vote on that already.

Mr. WADLEIGH. No. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York does not effect the purpose which it was intended to effect in the minds of the Senators present, as I understood.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator point out why?

Mr. WADLEIGH. If the Clerk will reread the amendment it will appear to everybody.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert after the word "rights" the words "of the United States;" and then to strike out the words—

Or prevent a distribution, in like manner as if this act had not been passed, in all cases where prosecution has been actually commenced, or in anywise affect suits or actions commenced or forfeitures incurred previous to May 1, 1874.

Mr. CONKLING. Wherein does not that effect the Senate's purpose as it stands?

Mr. WADLEIGH. As I understood the purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York it was to prevent these parties against whom the country has a just indignation from profiting by suits recently commenced by them for the purpose of obtaining moieties. The object of the amendment as I supposed was to prevent them profiting by those suits. Now, if the section is left as it stands without the amendment proposed by me, it will read thus:

That nothing herein contained shall affect existing rights or prevent a distribution in like manner as if this act had not been passed in all cases where prosecution has been actually commenced.

Then the Senator from New York adds an amendment which does not change the section as it stands so far as I have read, but which merely provides that it shall not affect suits brought after May 1, 1874. In my judgment that does not reach the difficulty. Perhaps I am mistaken, however.

Mr. SCOTT. If the words "before the 1st of May, 1874," were also inserted after the word "commenced," it would accomplish the purpose which the Senator from New Hampshire has, I think.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Yes; that would.

Mr. SCOTT. "Where prosecution has been actually commenced before the 1st of May, 1874," and make it apply to that as well as to the insertion made on the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Does it not mean that now?

Mr. SCOTT. I thought at the time it did; but my friend from New Hampshire thinks not.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I think if my friend from Pennsylvania will carefully examine the amendment he will come to the same conclusion that I have arrived at.

Mr. SHERMAN. But we are striking at some people who the Senator from New Hampshire says are very bad, and endeavoring to create oppression; and yet we are also striking at some other people who, in the honest discharge of public duty under existing law, have actually expended money in a search of moieties. It seems to me that while we are cutting up a system by the root as a vicious and bad one, we ought not to deprive people who have under the law earned money of that which the law offered to them at the time they earned it.

Mr. WADLEIGH. If the Senator from New York will make the amendment to his amendment suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I will withdraw the amendment offered by me; but if there is any one thing upon which the people of this country are determined, it is that the system pursued by Mr. Jayne and his coadjutors in matters of this kind shall be pursued no longer and that parties who after action by Congress on this matter was certain, commence suits at hap-hazard without evidence, just as was done in the case of the Sanborn contract, shall not profit by that action.

Mr. HOWE. Although they recover judgment?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Although they recover judgment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the amendment? I do not quite get the idea of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. WADLEIGH. It leaves the rights of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. What are those rights?

Mr. WADLEIGH. The right to the penalties.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It does not distribute them to informers?

Mr. WADLEIGH. It does not.

Mr. CONKLING. What does it do with the statute of limitations? Is that one of the rights of the United States?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Certainly. Perhaps I do not understand the question, however.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator introduces an amendment that saves existing rights of the United States, I ask whether the statute of limitations will take hold of actions which were commenced three years and more after the penalty was incurred, although they may have been commenced a year or two ago?

Mr. WADLEIGH. The statute of limitations could not affect those actions already commenced, in my judgment.

Mr. CONKLING. Upon which section of the bill does the Senator found that statement?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Under this section the existing rights of the United States are not to be affected. When the United States have commenced a suit and thereby acquired a right to the penalty, they cannot be divested of it by a provision in a subsequent law which limits their right of action to a certain period of time.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I think I can put in a word all I want to say about this. The Committee on Finance, intending to prevent this being a retroactive provision, inserted the words "that nothing herein contained shall affect existing rights or prevent the distribution in like manner as if this act had not been passed in all cases where prosecution has been actually commenced." There the committee stopped, deeming that sufficient. Perhaps it was sufficient; but various persons have called my attention to the fact that that would not save in reality all the opportunities of those concerned in existing cases. Therefore I moved to amend, as changed in deference to the Senator from Massachusetts, by inserting the words "or in anywise affect;" so as to read: "That nothing herein contained shall in anywise affect suits or actions commenced or forfeitures incurred previous to May 1, 1874."

That, I submit, presents pure and simple the question whether the Senate intends that this shall be ex post facto applying it to criminal cases, or retroactive applying it to civil cases, or whether it shall speak from the 1st of May on. That is all there is of it. Where it would be left by the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire I know not. I do not know how it would affect the statute of limitations. I have not looked at this bill to see how it would affect various things which are remedies as contradistinguished from rights. He says "existing rights." All lawyers know that all courts distinguish between the remedy and the right which the remedy pursues. Now if it should be held that although existing rights are saved remedies are affected, then we are hoist with our own petard. If we mean it shall not apply to suits commenced before a certain day, why not say so?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BAYARD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the force of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to be this: that the rights of the United States are reserved by his amendment; but he does object to any further perception of profits by informers under the moiety system. I hope that will be found to be the voice of the Senate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Jones, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Washburn—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Boutwell, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Mitchell, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, and Windom—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Ingalls, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Robertson, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, West, and Wright—32.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I have not been in during the discussion of this bill, and I want an opportunity to reserve an amendment. I do not know in what form it came in, but there is a provision here that I want to get out in some way:

Which forfeiture shall only apply to the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged fraud relates; and anything contained in any act which provides for the confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I want to get rid of this provision and I want to vote on it.

Mr. THURMAN. We had the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. STEWART. I was not here.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to submit one or two amendments. In the fourth section, in the thirteenth and fourteenth lines, I move to strike out the words "or submitting them to the officers of the revenue for examination." These words if retained will permit this course of action: that parties bringing in goods that are dutiable as personal luggage, offer the trunk or package to a custom-house inspector for examination, and if that inspector chooses, either from negligence or by the influence of corruption, to pass those goods, the Government will have no remedy to recover either the goods or any penalty. They might pursue him criminally, but otherwise would have no remedy whatever. If these words are stricken out, all parties importing goods would then be required to submit them to the custom-house for examination and entry, and in case they paid the duties through the intervention of an inspector they would of course be morally and legally relieved from all further application. I therefore hope the committee will consent to the amendment which I propose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have none.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask the attention of the committee again to the last part of section 13 on page 9, by which a party who might be charged with having entered goods fraudulently would be permitted to take from the collector such goods as he might have in bond, giving therefor a personal bond to indemnify the Government for the loss that might be sustained for the damages that might be recovered by proceedings at law. It seems to me that when a party who is charged with a fraud has goods in possession of the collector, and as by the first clause of this section the collector is authorzed to hold those goods to indemnify the Government, he should not be permitted to take those goods away upon a personal bond, for any one who has had any experience in regard to custom-house matters is well aware that a party who will commit a fraud will give a bond on which it will be next to impossible to make a recovery. I therefore hope that so much of this section as authorizes parties so charged to give a bond will be stricken from the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make any motion?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir; I move to strike out the last sentence of section [11] 13, commencing with the word "but" in line 9, to the end of the section, in the following words:

But nothing herein contained shall prevent any owner or claimant from obtaining a release of such merchandise on giving a bond, with sureties satisfactory to the collector, or, in case of judicial proceedings, satisfactory to the court, or judge thereof, for the payment of any fine or fines so incurred: Provided, however, That such merchandise shall in no case be released until all accrued duties thereon shall have been paid or secured.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to reserve at least one of those amendments. I refer now to the amendment last adopted before that moved by the Senator from Massachusetts, the amendment to section 29. There is another amendment which if I can put my eye upon it without detaining the Senate I will ask to reserve.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York in the Senate can move to insert the words again which were stricken out, without reserving the amendment here.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I reserve that one amendment because I do not want the words inserted and I do want the words inserted which I moved myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in the last section of the bill?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to reserve an amendment in section 12. I want to move to strike out all after the word "forfeited." There are several amendments in section 12, and I suppose I shall have to reserve them all so that the whole question will be open on that section.

Mr. SHERMAN. O, no; reserve the last amendment in the section.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; I will reserve the last amendment, after the word "forfeited" to the end of the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on concurring in the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole except those which have been reserved and specified.

The amendments were concurred in.

The first reserved amendment was in section [10] 12, lines 16, 17, and 18, to strike out the following words:

Liable to forfeiture, which forfeiture shall apply only to the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud, or alleged fraud, relates.

And to insert:

Forfeited; which forfeiture shall only apply to the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged fraud relates; and anything contained in any act which provides for the confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

So as to read:

And, in addition to such fine, such merchandise shall be forfeited; which forfeiture shall only apply to the particular item, &c.

Mr. STEWART. I believe this is a very dangerous provision. It has no reference to the moieties. You have stricken out all that relates to that subject. In my opinion there is nothing that tends so much to make people careful in the importation of goods as the provision that one fraudulent item shall vitiate the whole invoice, and there is reason for this. Remember that it must be done fraudulently. A person who is guilty of fraud in one part of an invoice is likely to commit many frauds in it, because, as a matter of fact, in practice only one package in ten is examined. Therefore if an importer should put laces in one box and the other boxes are filled with goods of no value, he stands ten chances to one to get them through the custom-house without paying a cent even as the law now stands, because there is not more than one chance in ten that they will fall upon that particular box or package. Now, having ten chances to one under the law as it stands, you propose to say by this bill to that importer, "If you get caught in that one chance in ten you will only forfeit the particular thing in which you are caught." If you are to say that nothing shall be forfeited but the particular thing that is caught, the particular item that is fraudulent, then you ought to make a provision for examining every package, or you will not get any revenue at all. It is a very common practice to put valuable goods in one class of boxes, and then through some means to have the officers only examine a certain box or package. They try all these chances, and frequently they get caught in that way. Now, if you take away that danger, and say that a man who has got a fraudulent invoice, if he has in any part of his invoice undertaken to defraud the revenue, the only penalty you will attach to it is the confiscation of that particular package or box where the fraud is detected, the chances for smuggling are increased tenfold.

It is said that the object of the bill is to cut off moieties, to cut off the improper seizure of goods, and to prevent the merchants from being annoyed; but in carrying out that object I do not think you ought to take away the chance of their suffering if they are willing to commit frauds and are detected in them. I do not suppose it is the real object to protect fraudulent importers and to give them more chances than they now possess. You have taken away many of the chances of detection, you have taken away your detective force, and now you want to take away the liability after detection has occurred in the custom-house, and after the man is caught in the fraudulent invoice, and you propose to say that he shall only forfeit that particular item. The inducement to smuggling will be increased, the chances for it will be increased, and the guards that will be exercised over the invoices will become less.

I recollect a case where there was the smuggling of opium on the ships of the Pacific Mail Steamship Line. The Chinese were in the habit of smuggling opium. Under the law the ship was liable to be forfeited for any acts of smuggling, and I recollect the exertions that were made by that company to prevent it. They had a special guard to watch those Chinamen and prevent them from smuggling, and the officers of the ship in doing that service were worth four times as much as all the officers of the Government; but if the only thing to be forfeited was to be the article smuggled, if they had no further interest in the matter, they would let it pass, perhaps connive at it.

Now you propose to repeal the law which would make the managers and officers of a ship responsible for any complicity in the smuggling of opium, and propose only to forfeit the little piece of opium that may be detected. You have repealed all that, as I understand. I have not had time to examine the bill thoroughly, but I believe that is the effect of it; and in that way you have opened the door very widely to smuggling. I hope I may be mistaken, but it strikes me that it is a great leak.

Mr. THURMAN. I have but a word to say on this amendment, for I do not want to detain the Senate. There are two objections to the present system of forfeiting the whole invoice. The first is that the punishment is monstrously disproportionate to the offense. The second objection to it is that there is no equality of punishment between different individuals who have committed the same offense. One man's invoice, as in a case that we have found in the testimony, amounting to more than $1,000,000, is liable to be forfeited, the entire amount of it, on the charge that some few items in that invoice the duties on which amounted to only a few hundred dollars had been improperly valued, improperly returned. There is a penalty of $1,000,000 and more inflicted upon that individual for precisely the same offense for which another man with an invoice of $50,000 worth of goods or $10,000 worth of goods would have only suffered the punishment of losing $10,000 or at most $50,000. You see there is no equality whatsoever in it. If the law said the forfeiture or penalty should be three times, four times, five times, ten times the amount of the smuggled goods or of the articles which were falsely undervalued, then there would be equality, and every man would be punished precisely alike; but to punish a man whose invoice is a million and a quarter to the whole extent of that invoice because there are found in it a few items amounting to a few thousand dollars undervalued or smuggled, if you choose, and to punish another man who has undervalued and smuggled precisely the same amount of items by forfeiture of only an invoice of $10,000, is manifest injustice, manifest want of equality, and in the first case the punishment is utterly disproportioned to the offense. I hope, therefore, that that amendment of the committee will be concurred in.

Mr. BOREMAN, (at seven o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) I think it is manifest we cannot get through with this bill to-night. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether if it should be established that the officers of one of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's ships were in complicity with the smuggling of opium, which is the particular smuggling business on that coast by the Chinese, the ship would be liable to forfeiture under this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. It would now.

Mr. STEWART. But would it under this bill after you have repealed all the laws providing for a forfeiture?

Mr. SHERMAN. We have been discussing this bill the whole day; and I have been here since twelve o'clock without eating anything, and the Senator has been out all the afternoon, and now he comes in and wants to ask and wants me to answer him questions about it.

Mr. STEWART. I have been engaged in other duties. This looks to me to be a very dangerous section. I undertake to say that if you will go from Havana or Panama to New York, after this bill is passed, you will find cargoes of cigars there, and every man who goes off the ship will go off with a load of them. If one should get caught, only the little package that he carries is confiscated, and there will be no supervision on the part of the officers of the ship at all, and you will have cigars and opium and various things smuggled in open daylight before those officers, who are now the only guards and the only means of preventing it. The cigars at the isthmus are about as cheap as at Havana. If the officers of these ships, who now do more than the officers of customs in guarding against this thing, are relieved of that responsibility, you will find a big door open to smuggling.

I have said all I desire to say. I do not wish to occupy more time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Wadleigh, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Jones, Oglesby, Sargent, and Stewart—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, and West—36.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The next reserved amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 29. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed; that nothing herein contained shall affect existing rights of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. I move now to insert words which I am told by my friend on my left [Mr. SCOTT] are acceptable to the Senator who offered the pending amendment. As explained to me, his view is to make this section perfect. After the word "commenced" should occur the words "previous to May 1, 1874." Am I right in that?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I move to amend the section as it stands by adding words as I will read them. After the word "commenced" insert a comma and add "previous to May 1, 1874;" and then follow with the words as they stood in my amendment, to wit:

Or in anywise affect suits or actions commenced, or forfeitures incurred, previous to May 1, 1874.

So as to repeat the date and apply it more certainly than the original form would to all parts of the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from New York state his amendment again?

Mr. CONKLING. I move to amend the section as reported by the Committee on Finance by adding after the word "commenced" the words "previous to May 1, 1874," and then adding the words "or in anywise affect suits or actions commenced or forfeitures incurred." This I offer in lieu of my amendment, and also of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, I being told by the Senator from Pennsylvania that it is satisfactory to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment as reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole, pending which the Senator from New York moves an amendment to it which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the words "of the United States."

Mr. WADLEIGH. If the words "of the United States" are stricken out, some court or other may construe the term "existing rights" to apply to the rights of informers. I do not propose to leave any loophole of that kind open, and I hope the amendment will not be made in that way.

Mr. ALCORN. If the words "of the United States" are stricken out, I will inquire whether there is any doubt that the courts would so construe it?

Mr. WADLEIGH. I think they would.

Mr. ALCORN. There can be no doubt about that, I think.

Mr. THURMAN. I want to understand this. That amendment does not include striking out the words "of the United States," does it?

Mr. CONKLING. It includes, the Senator will observe, the section precisely as he has it before him with these words added. It is the section as reported by the Finance Committee with the addition of these words. The words "of the United States" inserted there would change the meaning or might change it very seriously. Therefore I omit them and take the section just as the committee reported it, adding these words which I understand to be satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section reported by the Committee of the Whole terminates with the words "of the United States." The question is on that amendment. Pending that the Senator from New York moves to put in the place of those words the words in the printed bill plus the words he has stated.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely desire to state my understanding, which is that of the gentlemen around me. In case the amendment of the Senator from New York is now adopted, the result of the vote of the Senate sustaining the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will be lost, and by that vote a majority of the Senate declared themselves against the payment of any portion of fees and penalties for which suits have been instituted and are pending at this time to informers. Therefore if we desire, as I understand, to maintain the moneys which may flow from suits hereafter in the Treasury of the United States and not pay them for moieties, we shall reject the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Yes; and I want to say under this very bill, as I understand it, if any of these gentlemen have a just and equitable claim, that claim can be carried to the Secretary of the Treasury and settled by him. The object of my amendment is that there shall not be taken out of the Treasury of the United States money that belongs to the hard-working people of this country for the purpose of paying it over from the United States to these gentlemen who have made themselves odious to the people.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg to correct the honorable Senator from New Hampshire in one particular. Section 4, to which he refers, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay certain rewards for detecting and seizing goods, would relate solely to the future. It provides "that whenever"—as a matter of course that means hereafter—"any officer of the customs or other person shall detect and seize goods," &c. It will only operate in the future, and unless other words were inserted it would not authorize payment for services already rendered.

Mr. WADLEIGH. If that is so, then I would be in favor of letting these gentlemen bring their claims in and having their claims adjusted equitably, and I would not provide in this bill that they shall receive as a matter of right moieties from the United States upon the penalties which may be collected in the suits which have been commenced by them.

Mr. SCOTT. As the Senator from New York has referred to my understanding of the suggestion or agreement of the Senator from

New Hampshire, it is proper that I should state, after what the Senator from New Hampshire has said, that it is evident he misapprehended the proposition I made to him in reference to this amendment. I did suppose that it was his desire that the words suggested by the Senator from New York should be inserted after the word "commenced" and that the words "of the United States" should be taken out of the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator so told me.

Mr. SCOTT. And believing that to be his understanding, I did so state to the Senator from New York. It is evident either that I misunderstood the Senator from New Hampshire, or that he misunderstood me.

Mr. WADLEIGH. That was a misapprehension, because if the words "of the United States" are stricken out, I understand the term "existing rights" would apply to the rights of these informers.

Mr. SARGENT. And allow distribution.

Mr. WADLEIGH. And allow distribution.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator explain how he could allow the words to remain "or prevent a distribution in like manner as if this act had not been passed?"

Mr. WADLEIGH. I do not desire to have anything in this bill under which they may possibly go into the courts or go anywhere and get moieties.

Mr. SARGENT. Those are the words the Senator was willing should be restored, proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADLEIGH. If the term "existing rights" is confined to the rights of the United States, that is one thing. If the term "existing rights" is to apply to all existing rights, it may be held to apply to the rights of informers, and that I do not propose to assent to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Carpenter, Conkling, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Jones, Mitchell, Scott, and Sherman—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Wadleigh, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Tipton, and West—42.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill remains as the unfinished business, I suppose, in the morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does. Does the Senator move an adjournment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see that there is any alternative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at seven o'clock and forty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 9, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

KANSAS COAT OF ARMS IN THE HALL.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the architect of the Capitol be, and he is hereby, instructed to forthwith cause the coat of arms of the State of Kansas to be placed in its proper panel in the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. MONROE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) to print the report of the Commissioner of Education; which was read a first and second time, under the law referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES IN PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. PRATT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3653) to protect the interest of the United States in certain public lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. McDILL, of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3654) to quiet the title of settlers on certain railroad lands in the State of Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN MYERS.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3655) granting a pension to John Myers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

Mr. LOWNDES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House with the supplemental reports of the engineers on the extension of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal.

PRINTING OF DEBATES.

Mr. DONNAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to submit a report relative to the cost of publishing the debates at the Government Printing Office and by the proprietors of the Globe, with the accompanying testimony. I move that the same be printed and recommitted to the committee. One of my colleagues on the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WADDELL,] dissents from some of the conclusions of the committee. I understand he has left his views with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STORM,] and I ask that they be printed with the report of the majority.

Mr. STORM. I am requested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] to submit his views with an accompanying resolution upon the subject of printing the debates.

The report, with the views of the minority, was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent that the first hour after the reading of the Journal to-morrow may be given to the Committee on Ways and Means to make reports. We have not been called for some time.

Mr. RANDALL. With the understanding that all points of order are reserved.

Mr. DAWES. Of course.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

EASTERN AND WESTERN TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

Mr. McCRARY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3656) to incorporate the Eastern and Western Transportation Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY J. DRYSDALE.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3657) to remove the charge of desertion against the record of Henry J. Drysdale, late of Company E, Seventy-first Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the committee have leave to report this bill at any time.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

CLERK OF COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

Mr. ARCHER. The Committee on Accounts have unanimously directed me to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the compensation of the clerk of the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be the same as that paid the clerk of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAWES. Is the House aware that the Committee on Claims has a clerk at a fixed salary, paid the year round?

Mr. ARCHER. The clerk of the Committee on Pensions is kept here the whole vacation fixing up bills for the Committee on Pensions. The Committee on Accounts have fully examined this matter, and they find that there are about six hundred cases that must be examined this summer. They think this is a very meritorious case.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would suggest that the object of this resolution can be accomplished only by legislation, not by resolution of the House.

Mr. ARCHER. Not to pay it out of the contingent fund of the House for committee clerks?

Mr. GARFIELD. You cannot pay the clerks of committees out of the contingent fund of the House; the law expressly forbids that. The provision must be put in a law, either on some appropriation bill or as a separate law.

Mr. DAWES. There are four clerks of committees who are paid a yearly salary. One of them, it seems to me, might as well come in under the general rule of daily compensation. In times past he had a great deal to do, but he has not much now. But at the present time there are only four committee clerks who receive regular annual salaries, the rest being paid a per diem.

Mr. GARFIELD. The question of fixing the salaries of all clerks whose pay is not fixed annually, fixing it uniformly for the two Houses, is now pending in a conference committee, and we hope to be able to arrive at some arrangement.

Mr. ARCHER. In that case I will withdraw this resolution for the present.

WILLIAM J. COITE.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3658) for the relief of William J. Coite; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SYPHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation, occupying not more than three minutes.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman will proceed. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SYPHER. The gentlemen who were yesterday allowed the privilege of the floor for the purpose of defending their claims to seats in this House saw proper to make an assault upon me personally, and indirectly upon the House for seating me upon my prima facie title, and argued that because the House had taken such action it must of necessity follow that as precedent in this case.

I was elected from the first district of Louisiana. The contestants here were candidates for the State at large. Therefore there can be no similarity between the two cases. Secondly, after I was seated upon my prima facie title the House opened the case for the purpose of taking testimony, and gave ninety days in which that testimony was to be taken under the statute. I went to my home and devoted my time—the forty days allotted me—to the examination of over fifty witnesses, whose testimony, now before the Committee on Elections, establishes my right to a seat in this House by over 3,000 majority. I state this in justification of the gentlemen who voted in this House to give me my seat upon my prima facie title.

CIRCUIT COURTS IN CALIFORNIA, OREGON, AND NEVADA.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, there came over yesterday from the Senate a bill changing the time of holding some terms of court on the Pacific coast. The time for holding those courts is very near; and it is important the bill should be considered at once. I understand there is no objection to it. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken from the Speaker's table and considered now.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 881) fixing the times of holding the circuit courts of the United States in the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time. It provides hereafter a term of the circuit court of the United States for the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada shall be held as follows: For the district of California, in the city of San Francisco, on the second Monday of March, July, and November of each year; for the district of Oregon, in the city of Portland, on the second Monday of April, August, and November of each year; and for the district of Nevada, in the city of Carson, on the second Monday of March, June, and October of each year.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOUISIANA ELECTION CONTEST—SHERIDAN vs. PINCHBACK.

Mr. SYPHER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being call for, the House resumes the consideration of the resolutions reported from the Committee on Elections in the case of Sheridan vs. Pinchback, from the State of Louisiana. The first question is upon the amendment offered yesterday by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. DARRALL,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback is entitled prima facie to a seat in this House as a member at large from the State of Louisiana, without prejudice to the claim of George A. Sheridan, contestant for said seat.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the resolutions offered by the minority of the Committee on Elections as a substitute for the resolutions of the majority.

The resolutions of the minority were read, as follows:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback was not elected as a member of the Forty-third Congress from the State of Louisiana at large.

Resolved, That George A. Sheridan was duly elected as a member of the Forty-third Congress from the State of Louisiana at large, and is entitled to a seat in this House as such member.

Mr. WOODFORD called for a division of the question upon the resolutions.

The question being taken on the first resolution, it was agreed to.

The question recurring on the second resolution,

Mr. SPEER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 72, nays 145, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Fort, Giddings, Glover, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Leach, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Perry, Randall, Read, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Sloss, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Storm, Swann, Vance, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, and John D. Young—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crocker, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hodges, Hooper, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kellogg, Killinger, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Nunn, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Pierce, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Rice, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whiteley, Charles W. Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Woodford—145.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Barnum, Barry, Begole, Biery, Bright, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Curtis, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Elliott, Farwell, Garfield, Robert S. Hale, Harrison, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Holman, Jewett, Kelley, Kendall, Luttrell, Maynard, McJunkin, McKee, McNulta, Mitchell, Myers, Negley, Niles, O'Neill, Orr, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Phelps, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Poland, Potter, Pratt, Robbins, William R. Roberts, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, George L. Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Stephens, St. John, Stone, Stowell, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Waddell, White, Wilber, George Willard, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—72.

So the resolution was not adopted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, stated that he was paired with Mr. POLAND, who if present would vote in the negative, while he himself would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana, stated that he was paired with Mr. STONE, of Missouri, who if present would vote in the affirmative, while he himself would vote in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to reconsider the vote by which the House adopted the resolution that Mr. P. B. S. Pinchback was not elected as a member of the Forty-third Congress from the State of Louisiana at large. I think that resolution was adopted under a misapprehension of the facts. The committee have reported that neither gentleman was elected, and in an additional resolution they reported that both shall have leave to take further testimony. If the resolution be adopted that Mr. Pinchback is not elected, it will preclude him of course from taking further testimony. I therefore move to reconsider the vote by which that resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to reconsider the vote by which the House adopted the resolution reported from the minority of the committee that Mr. Pinchback was not elected.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The adoption of that resolution precludes him from taking further testimony according to the report of the majority of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been informed by several gentlemen that they did not understand the vote when it was submitted to the House.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the adoption of the resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback was not elected as a member of the Forty-third Congress from the State of Louisiana at large.

Mr. ELDREDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to make an explanation.

Mr. BECK. I object.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Elect him now if you choose.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 94, nays 121, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Arthur, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crocker, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Davis, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Fort, Freeman, Giddings, Glover, Gunckel, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Ambler Smith, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Storm, Swann, Vance, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Wood, Woodford, and John D. Young—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cotton, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Foster, Frye, Gooch, Hagans, Harmer, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Snyder, Starkweather, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Waddell, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Whiteley, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, and William B. Williams—121.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Ashe, Barnum, Barry, Begole, Bright, Bundy, Roderick R. Butler, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Corwin, Curtis, Danford, Dawes, DeWitt, Elliott, Farwell, Garfield, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hersey, George F. Thomas, Tyner, Waldron, Wheeler, Wilber, George Willard, Wilshire, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—74.

So the resolution was rejected.

During the roll call,

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana, stated that he was paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. STONE, who would vote in the affirmative, while he himself would vote in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question next recurred on the adoption of the following resolutions reported from the majority of the committee:

Resolved, That the evidence in this case is not sufficient to establish the right of either P. B. S. Pinchback or George A. Sheridan to a seat in this House as a Representative at large from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That Mr. Sheridan have leave to amend his notice of contest, if he shall so elect, serving upon Mr. Pinchback his amended notice within twenty days hereafter; that Mr. Pinchback have liberty to answer such amended notice within forty days hereafter, and that, upon the service of such answer, the evidence of the respective parties be taken, under the existing laws of Congress in such case made and provided; and that in case of default of an answer to such amended notice, Mr. Sheridan be at liberty to take testimony ex parte; and in case of default to serve an amended notice of contest, Mr. Pinchback may serve a notice of contest, as provided by law, within forty days hereafter, and take testimony in like manner.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to report from the Committee on the Judiciary a substitute for the act (S. No. 7) for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain, and I ask that the substitute only be read.

Mr. SPEER. Does the reporting of this bill supersede the special order, which is reports of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice?

The SPEAKER. That cannot be called up for some fifteen minutes yet.

Mr. SPEER. But will this bill supersede that special order when the hour shall arrive?

The SPEAKER. This will have to give way at the hour fixed for the special order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that the substitute be read.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

An act to provide for a just and equitable distribution of the moneys paid in pursuance of the award made to the United States by the commissioners at Geneva, under the treaty of Washington.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That out of the money paid by the government of Great Britain in satisfaction of the award of the arbitration at Geneva under the treaty of Washington, indemnification to the United States and citizens thereof, and corporations organized under the laws thereof, or the laws of the several States and Territories therein, shall be established and paid from the Treasury, in the manner hereinafter provided, to the following classes of claimants, in the manner following:

First. For all loss, destruction, or damage by any confederate cruiser for whose acts the Government of the United States have made demand upon the government of Great Britain, done to or suffered by all such corporations and citizens of the United States, actual owners of property at the time of its destruction, whether ships or cargoes, outfit, advanced or other wages paid to officers and seamen, or freights actually earned.

To the officers and crews, being citizens aforesaid, all the wages which had been actually earned by them, up to the time of the capture, loss, or destruction of any vessel by such cruisers, together with the individual property of each respectively captured and lost or destroyed in the vessel so captured, who have not received the insurance thereupon; and to such officers and crews, or to any person on board either of said vessels, an indemnity for damages actually sustained from such capture or detention, and the amount expended in returning to their homes, or the place where they engaged in business or took employment, respectively, not including any prospective profits or wages, not earned at the time of capture, or which had been theretofore paid them.

To the United States, for all vessels the property of the Government or which were under charter to the United States, and for the destruction or loss of which the United States by the terms of the charter party was liable, which were captured and destroyed and lost by said cruisers, together with the property of the United States on board, and the same indemnity to the officers and crews of said vessels, respectively, as hereinbefore provided in case of capture of private vessels, except any losers insured in part or in whole for the property so lost, in which case the indemnity shall be made only for the loss beyond the sum received by the loser from such insurance.

To all insurers, being citizens or corporations of the United States, respectively, having insured or reinsured property so destroyed, who shall show, by an exhibit of their books of account and business, or otherwise, that the war premiums actually received by them did not equal in amount the losses paid by them because of property thereafterward captured and lost or destroyed by either or all of said cruisers: Provided, That no insurer shall have any claim or right in the claims of any assured herein provided for because of any assignment, either in law or in fact, unless such assignee had actually paid a just and adequate consideration therefor other than underwriting the policy or settling or paying any loss claimed by the assured.

Secondly. To all such corporations or citizens as aforesaid who had paid a premium for war risks on vessels and cargoes, freights, or other property therein, after the sailing of either of said cruisers, to the amount of such extra or war premiums only, paid by them, whether they suffered loss by capture of their vessels and property or otherwise by said cruisers: Provided, That mutual insurance companies who have paid a loss shall be indemnified for the same such indemnity to be divided among its members who contributed to pay such loss at the time; but no member of any mutual insurance company shall be indemnified for any war premium paid in such company: Provided further, That no claim for premiums paid for war risks which has been heretofore or may hereafter be assigned or transferred to any person, in whole or in part, or on which any lien or interest is secured in any way, shall be allowed by the court before which such claim is made; and the claimant thereof shall, in addition to his statement of his claim as hereinafter provided, declare under oath that there is no lien or claim thereon, and that no sale or transfer thereof has been made either in whole or in part; and upon proof made to the satisfaction of the court that any lien has been put thereon, or that any assignment or transfer has been made of any such claim, the same shall not be allowed; and upon proof being made to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury of any such lien, transfer, or assignment prior to issuing the warrant therefor, he shall stop the payment of any judgment thereon.

SEC. 2. That in ascertaining the losses so suffered no account shall be taken of prospective profits, or of freight not then earned, or of profits of charter-parties not then fulfilled, save that where any vessel carrying freight or passengers, or bound on a fishing or whaling voyage, had partly performed her voyage only at the time of such capture, destruction, or loss, the portion of the passage-money and freight which would have been, if the voyage had been carried out, then earned or accrued respectively, or the portion of the actual expense of such voyage, in ratio to the part of the passage or cruise to be performed at the time of such capture, only shall be allowed, deducting the portion of provisions and outfit then expended. In ascertaining the amount of such losses, the memorials, affidavits, depositions, and any other papers in the several cases of losses claimed respectively, now filed in the State Department, or official copies thereof, may be read in evidence: Provided, That no affidavit shall be read except where it appears to the satisfaction of the tribunal that the affiant cannot be produced before it as a witness or his testimony taken by a commission upon interrogatories; and in the hearing of the cause, any party claiming shall produce all books, papers, letters, and documents that may be called for by a general description thereof by any opposing party, or satisfactorily account for their loss or non-production, or suffer such judgment as is prescribed in section 15 of the act entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," approved September 29, 1789; and on the hearing of the cause, any competent evidence may be produced by either party, either viva voce or by deposition taken upon interrogatories; and for this purpose depositions may be taken by either party de bene, or the court may admit affidavits where it is satisfactorily shown that the witness cannot be produced or his examination by interrogatories and cross-examination cannot be had.

SEC. 3. That within sixty days after the passage of this act the Attorney-General of the United States shall file in the circuit court of the United States, in a circuit to be designated by the President, a bill in equity, in the nature of a bill of interpleader, which shall state, if any, what claim on said money paid upon said award is made by the Government of the United States for losses or damages, with a concise statement of the facts, grounds, and nature of such claims, respectively; and also that the United States hold the money paid by Great Britain in pursuance of said award, and the interest accruing thereon, subject to the just claim of all persons and corporations entitled thereto, under the provisions and limitations set forth in this act, and not otherwise. All persons, companies, or corporations who have already filed claims in the State Department for losses or damages caused by either of said cruisers shall be named as defendants in said bill, and that they claim severally to be entitled to portions of the said money, but the particulars of their several claims need not be set forth. And notice of the commencement and pendency of such bill shall be given by publishing the substance thereof in one public newspaper in each State and Territory at least once a week for three months successively. And such notice shall state the day of filing such bill, and that every person, company, or corporation claiming to be entitled to any part of said fund, and desiring to appear and become a party thereto to assert such claim, is required to enter an appearance therein within six months from the filing of such bill. And each and every person, company, or corporation, whether named as a defendant in said bill or not, who shall not enter an appearance thereto within said six months, shall be forever barred of all right or claim in or to any part of said award: Provided, however, That the court may allow, within thirty days thereafter, any party to enter an appearance upon proper cause showing that such party was prevented therefrom by fraud, accident, or mistake.

SEC. 4. That every person, company, or corporation who shall, within six months after the filing of said bill, appear and claim to be entitled to any part of said award shall be admitted as a party defendant therein; and within two months after the expiration of said six months, every claimant to any part of said award who has duly entered as a defendant in said cause shall file in said court a statement, under oath of the party or his duly authorized agent, giving concisely and clearly the facts and grounds of his claim, and the amount thereof, together with such exhibits as he may be advised, which statement and the exhibits shall be in print, and twenty copies thereof filed in said courts: Provided, That those persons named as defendants and claimants in the bill may file such statement of their claims at any time after said bill is filed, and before the expiration of said six months, at their option.

SEC. 5. That immediately after the filing of such statement of claim by any claimant, the court shall fix a reasonable time for such claimant to take and file his evidence in support thereof, and shall allow the Government reasonable time to take and file evidence in opposition thereto; and any claimant shall be allowed to file evidence in opposition to any claim made by the United States to any part of such fund; and all testimony shall be taken in the manner and according to the practice of the court in equity causes, subject to the provisions of the second section of this act.

SEC. 6. That when the evidence is closed upon any claim, the court shall hear and determine the same in accordance with the provisions of this act; and in all its proceedings herein the court shall be governed by the rules of practice of courts of equity of the United States so far as the same may be applicable.

SEC. 7. That whenever more than $5,000 of any claim shall be disallowed by the court, the claimant, within thirty days, but not afterward, may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; and whenever any claim exceeding $5,000 shall be allowed, the United States shall have the same right of appeal; and if any claim shall be allowed in favor of the United States exceeding $5,000, any claimant, or any number of claimants jointly, may appeal therefrom; and all appeals shall be taken according to the law and rules governing appeals in equity from the circuit to the Supreme Court, but only so much of the record of the circuit court contained in the bills, pleadings, and evidence as may pertain to the claim in the judgment appealed from shall be sent up. Upon the allowance of any such appeal, it shall pass immediately to the Supreme Court for hearing, without awaiting the decision of other claims; and such appeal shall not delay proceedings in the circuit court upon other claims filed in the cause: Provided, however, That the death of any defendant shall not work a discontinuance of any part of the proceedings, but the legal representative may appear and prosecute his claim within such time as the court may order.

SEC. 8. That all appeals from the allowance or disallowance of such claims shall be entered at the term of the Supreme Court next after such appeal; and the Supreme Court shall give them precedence of other causes in said court, so far that they shall, if practicable, be heard at the term they are entered; and the decision of the Supreme Court shall be certified back to the court from which the appeal was taken.

SEC. 9. That when the time shall have expired in which any claim can be filed ni said court, the judge shall certify a list of all such claims, showing in detail the gross amounts thereof, to the Secretary of State, who shall cause a certified copy of such lists to be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 10. That whenever final judgment shall be rendered in the circuit or Supreme Court in favor of any claimant, a certified copy thereof shall be issued to the claimant, and a like copy be filed in the State Department.

SEC. 11. That in case any judgment is rendered by a circuit court for indemnity for any loss or claim hereinbefore mentioned against the United States at the time of the giving of the judgment, the circuit court shall, upon motion of the attorney or counsel for the claimant, allow, out of the amount thereby awarded, such reasonable counsel and attorney fees to the counsel and attorney employed by the claimant or claimants respectively as the court shall determine is just and reasonable, as compensation for the services rendered the claimant in prosecuting such claims, which allowance shall be entered as part of the judgment in such case, and shall be made specifically payable as a part of said judgment for indemnification to the attorney or counsel, or both, to whom the same shall be adjudged; and a warrant shall issue from the Treasury in favor of the person to whom such allowance shall be made respectively, which shall be in full compensation to the counsel or attorney for prosecuting such claim; and all other liens upon, or assignments, sales, transfers, either absolute or conditional, for services rendered or to be rendered about any claim or part or parcel thereof provided for in this bill heretofore or hereafter made or done before such judgment is awarded and the warrant issued therefor, shall be absolutely null and void and of none effect.

SEC. 12. That in estimating the compensation to claimants, interest shall be allowed at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum upon the amount of actual loss or damage which shall be adjudicated in each case to have been sustained, from the date of the award of the arbitrators at Geneva.

SEC. 13. That the President may designate a counselor at law, admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of the United States, to appear as counsel on behalf of the United States and represent the interest of the Government in said suit and in all claims filed for indemnity for losses, as provided by this act, subject to the supervision and control of the Attorney-General. Such counsel shall receive for his services and expenses such reasonable allowance in each claim as may be approved by the court, to be apportioned in each claim adjudicated, and paid from said award upon the certificate of the judge.

SEC. 14. That if the amount of all claims filed in said cause shall not exceed the amount of said award, all the judgments of said court when final, or of the Supreme Court, shall be paid as soon as certified; but if it shall appear that the gross amount of said claims so filed, with the interest and costs thereof as herein provided, shall exceed the whole amount of said award and interest, then the judgments on the first class of claims hereinbefore set forth only shall be paid in full when certified; and of the judgments upon claims of the second class hereinbefore provided 50 per cent. only shall be paid upon certificates thereof until all of said claims so filed in court shall be determined and go into final judgment, when the remainder of the money paid on said award and the accrued interest shall be divided pro rata among said judgment claimants, but not to exceed the full amount of their said judgments, with interest thereon up to the time of the rendition thereof.

SEC. 15. That when it shall appear to the Secretary of the Treasury by the certificate of the court, under the seal thereof, that a final judgment has been rendered in favor of a claimant, he shall issue his warrant for the payment of the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, from time to time, to sell in the market, after the notice, or cancel, at his election, such amount of the bonds of the United States in which such award paid by the government of Great Britain has been invested as will reimburse the Treasury for the amounts paid upon such judgments, or the United States for the amount of any judgment that may be recovered in favor of the United States against the money so paid; and after all judgments issued upon said losses and claims have been paid and satisfied, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cancel the remainder of said bonds, and cover the money secured thereby into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I enter a motion to recommit the bill and allow an amendment, which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] desires to offer, to be pending.

Mr. FRYE. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out on page 14, line 64, these words:

Provided, That mutual insurance companies who have paid a loss shall be indemnified for the same, such indemnity to be divided among its members who contributed to pay such loss at the time; but no member of any mutual insurance company shall be indemnified for any war premium paid in such company.

Mr. TREMAIN. The committee has given no permission to allow that amendment to be offered. Is it in order?

The SPEAKER. It does not depend on the permission of the committee.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. TREMAIN. Am I to understand that no amendments can be received unless the chairman of the committee allows them?

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the committee enters a motion to recommit the bill and intimates that he will allow the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to be pending. The Chair will rule on the questions in regard to amendments when they come up.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. TREMAIN. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (H. R. No. 1979) to preserve the ballots cast and all the papers connected with elections held for Delegates to Congress, and for other purpose, and to move that the bill be printed and recommitted. And I give notice that on Saturday next I will move to suspend the rules to put the bill on its passage.

Mr. COX. I object.

Mr. TREMAIN. The motion is merely to print and recommit.

Mr. COX. Let it be on the condition that it is not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The bill was ordered to be printed and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House, made under a suspension of the rules, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SENER,] the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, is entitled to the floor to report certain bills.

MIDDLE DISTRICT OF ALABAMA.

Mr. SENER. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM,] to offer a resolution which will not give rise to any discussion.

Mr. DURHAM. The Attorney-General, in his annual report, calls attention to the fact that the clerk of the district court for the middle district of Alabama has failed to settle his semi-annual accounts; and on the 26th day of March a resolution was adopted by the House instructing the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to investigate that matter. The committee have investigated it, and they ask the House to adopt the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to institute legal proceedings against E. V. C. Blake, the clerk of the middle district of Alabama, and his sureties on his bond, for the recovery of whatever sum may be due and owing by said Blake to the United States as clerk aforesaid.

Mr. DURHAM. I will simply state that the report of the committee, made after an investigation of the matter, shows that this clerk is indebted to the Government of the United States about $12,000; and the Attorney-General desires some instruction, as to how he shall proceed to recover the money. I ask the adoption of that resolution.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WESTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. SENER. Mr. Speaker, it is well known that since the 16th day of February the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice have had under consideration the expenditures in the western district of Arkansas. After two or three months of patient and laborious investigation the committee have presented a report, which will be found in the document-room, Report No. 626, and have instructed me to report in connection therewith three bills and one resolution. I will first call up the bill No. 3621 for consideration.

The bill (H. R. No. 3621) to abolish the western district of Arkansas, and for other purposes, was read. It proposes to abolish the western district of Arkansas and to annex the territory constituting the same to and make it a part of the eastern district of Arkansas, to all intents and purposes whatsoever; said districts hereafter to constitute one district, to be known and designated as the district of Arkansas. The bill further provides that all causes, proceedings, and records now pending in or pertaining to the judicial business of said late western district of Arkansas shall be held, entered, kept, tried, and disposed of by the proper courts and judges for said eastern district in the same manner and to the same effect as if they had been originally commenced, proceeded with, or determined therein. And until further provision shall be made by law, courts shall be held at the same places and at the same times now provided by law in the said State; and all the judicial power now exercised by the district court for said late western district of Arkansas in respect to causes and matters arising in the Indian Territory are hereby conferred upon the district court for said eastern district; and it shall be the duty of the marshal for said eastern district to take possession of, and hold as part of the records and documents of said court, all records, files, papers, and other official documents now appertaining to the office and business of the marshal of said western district; but the clerks and clerks' office of said western district, and the records, dockets, files, papers, and official documents now appertaining to the office and business of the clerks shall be and remain as they are on the day before this act goes into effect, until otherwise ordered by the circuit and district judges for the district of Arkansas, who shall have the power of removal and appointment as now provided by law; and said records, dockets, files, papers, and other official documents appertaining to the office and business of the clerk and marshal of said western district shall have and be given the same force and effect as if they had been originally a part of the files and records of said eastern district; and the offices of all United States commissioners in said western district of Arkansas shall be vacated from and after the passage of this act, and until new appointments are made by the United States circuit court in and for the district of Arkansas.

The bill in its second section amends the third section of the act entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1858," approved June 14, 1858, by striking out the words "three persons in any of the States respectively," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one person when necessary, except when the judge of his district shall certify in writing that two persons are necessary;" and provided that when two are deemed insufficient, the marshal shall apply for aid to the nearest commanding officer of the Army, whose duty it shall be to furnish the same.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SENER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SENER. I report also from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to institute a full and thorough judicial investigation into the character of the allowances that have been paid out of the Treasury Department as well as the claims still due, growing out of the expenditures of the marshal's office of the western district of Arkansas since the 1st day of July, 1870, and to report the result thereof to this House at the first day of the next session.

Mr. SENER. In regard to this resolution I wish to say that I have no desire to discuss it. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] who is a member of the committee desires some time thereon.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does this come in under the privilege granted to the committee?

Mr. SENER. It comes in under a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. A suspension of the rules was limited to four bills that were included in the gentleman's motion.

Mr. SENER. Then does the Chair decide that no discussion is in order on this resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that if objection be made to the resolution being reported it cannot be reported.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object if it is to occupy any time.

Mr. SENER. I desire to direct the attention of the Chair to the fact that the committee obtained leave to have the report considered in connection with the bills, and this resolution is distinctly embraced in the report.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will determine that question. The entry in the Journal is as follows:

TUESDAY, June 9. One hour after the reading of the Journal the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice are allowed the floor to consider, in the House, House bills 3577, 3578, 3579, and 3580.

The Chair understands that the bills now reported are substitutes for these.

Mr. SPEER. Is there objection to this resolution being considered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to object if it takes time. He objects, not to the resolution but to the consumption of time.

Mr. SENER. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resolution will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. HYNES. I object unless I am allowed to offer an amendment to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot object conditionally.

Mr. HYNES. Then I object.

Mr. SENER. Let me give notice that on the first day I can get a suspension of the rules of the House I will ask the House to pass this most necessary resolution, and if I had supposed there would have been any objection to it the other bill would not have been passed without some remarks on my part that would have shown the necessity of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can get the floor for that purpose on Thursday.

Mr. HYNES. Allow me to state, with the indulgence of the House, that I do not object to the adoption of the report of the committee, but I ask in justice to certain parties that an amendment shall be made.

Mr. SENER. I have no objection to the amendment being read.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

And that no part of said claims be paid until the Department has been satisfied by investigation of their correctness.

Mr. SENER. Let me explain the difference between the amendment and the resolution as reported by the committee. The gentleman proposes that the Department shall pass finally in judgment on the question of the propriety of these claims, and the committee propose that there shall be a further report to this House.

Mr. HYNES. Allow me to state that the purpose of my amendment is this: That after there has been a judicial investigation and the correctness of the accounts has been established, the parties to whom the money is due after such trial and investigation shall receive their money without waiting until next winter to have the matter reported to Congress and passed upon by Congress.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to say, in view of the evidence taken by the committee, that these accounts suspended in the Treasury Department, if not fraudulent, are strongly tainted with fraud. They should never be paid until the strictest examination has been made and the House has had an opportunity of passing on them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HYNES] objects to the resolution without his amendment, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] objects to the amendment. The resolution is not before the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, requested the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 3652) providing for the publication of the revised statutes of the United States.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, joint resolution (H. R. No. 107) providing for the termination of the treaty between the United States and His Majesty, the King of the Belgians, concluded at Washington July 17, 1859.

PUBLICATION OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. POLAND. Some members of the Senate think there should be some provision made in relation to the distribution of the statutes among the districts. I hope the request of the Senate for the return of the bill will be acceded to.

There was no objection; and it was ordered that the bill be returned to the Senate.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, who is entitled to the floor, I desire to make a report of a bill from the Joint Select Committee to Inquire into the Affairs of the District of Columbia for the purpose of printing and recommittal.

The bill (H. R. No. 3659) for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I ask that the testimony and report of the committee be printed.

The order to print was made.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry in this connection. The committee had leave to report at any time, and the session is now drawing to a close. I desire to know whether this report exhausts that leave?

The SPEAKER. It does not exhaust it. The leave was not limited to one report.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The bill is not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The committee have the right to report at any time.

BONDS OF CLERKS OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. SENER. I now call up the bill (H. R. No. 3622) to amend the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789, in relation to bonds of clerks of the courts of the United States.

The bill was read. The first section provides that the seventh section of the act entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," approved September 24, 1789, be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Supreme Court and the circuit and district courts shall have power to appoint clerks for their respective courts, according to the laws now in force; and each of said clerks shall, before he enters upon the execution of his office, take the following oath or affirmation, to wit:

"I, A B, being appointed clerk of ——, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will truly and faithfully enter and record all the orders, decrees, judgments, and proceedings of the said court; and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties of my said office according to the best of my abilities and understanding: so help me God."

Which words "so help me God" shall be omitted in all cases where an affirmation is admitted instead of an oath. And each of said clerks shall give bond with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the court for which he is appointed, to the United States in the sum of not less than $5,000 nor more than $20,000, to be determined and regulated by the Attorney-General of the United States, faithfully to discharge the duties of his office, and seasonably to record the decrees, judgments, and determinations of the court of which he is clerk; and it shall be the duty of the district attorneys of the United States, upon requirement by the Attorney-General, to give thirty days' notice of motion in their several courts that new bonds, in accordance with the terms of this act, are required to be executed; and upon failure of any clerk to execute such new bond, his office shall be deemed vacant. The Attorney-General may at any time, upon like notice through the district attorney, require a bond of increased amount, in his discretion, from any of said clerks within the limit of the amount above specified; and the failure of the clerk to execute the same shall in like manner vacate his office. All bonds given by the clerks shall, after approval, be recorded in their respective offices, and copies thereof from the records certified by the clerks under seal of court shall be competent evidence in any court. The original bonds shall be filed in the Department of Justice.

The second section provides that if the clerk of any court of the United States shall neglect for one year to render to the Department of Justice any return of the fees and emoluments of his office, the Attorney-General shall notify the judge of the court of this fact; and unless the clerk, within sixty days thereafter, makes explanation of the delay satisfactory to the Attorney-General, it shall be the duty of the said judge to remove the clerk from office.

The third section provides that the circuit courts of the United States, for the purposes of the act, shall have power to award the writ of mandamus, according to the course of the common law, upon motion of the Attorney-General or the district attorney of the United States, to any officer thereof, to compel him to make the returns and perform the duties therein required.

Mr. SPEER. I believe the committee has an hour upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. SPEER. Then I desire to be heard upon it.

Mr. SENER. I have no desire to make any speech on this bill. It simply provides three things: first, that all clerks of the United States courts shall be required to increase their bonds to a sum ranging between a minimum of $5,000 and a maximum of $20,000. The old act of 1789 makes the bonds of clerks of the United States courts uniform at $2,000. In our opinion, which has also been supported by the Department of Justice, these bonds are too low and ought to be increased.

Another provision of the bill requires that in case any of the clerks of the respective courts of the United States fail to make their returns of fees and emoluments as required by law, the Attorney General may require the judge to remove that defaulting clerk. The third provision of the bill is to this effect: that in case these clerks fail to make these returns as required by law, the Attorney-General may require them to do so by mandamus.

[Mr. SPEER addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SENER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FEES AND COSTS OF OFFICERS OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. SENER also, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3623) to amend the twenty-third paragraph of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the twenty-third paragraph of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853, be amended so as to read as follows:

"That before any bill of costs shall be taxed by any judge or other officer, or any account payable out of the money of the United States shall be allowed by any officer of the Treasury, in favor of clerks, marshals, or district attorneys, the party claiming such account shall render the same, with the vouchers and items thereof, to a United States circuit or district court, and in presence of the district attorney or his sworn assistant, whose presence shall be noted on the record, prove in open court, to the satisfaction of the court, by his own oath or that of other persons having knowledge of the facts, to be attached to such account, that the services therein charged have been actually and necessarily performed as therein stated; and that the disbursements charged have been fully paid in lawful money; and the court shall thereupon cause to be entered of record an order approving or disapproving the account, as it may or may not regard the same proved and justified by law. United States commissioners shall forward their accounts, duly verified by oath, to the district attorneys of their respective districts, by whom they shall be submitted for approval in open court. Accounts and vouchers of marshals shall be made in duplicate, to be marked respectively 'original' and 'duplicate.' And it shall be the duty of the clerk to forward the original accounts and vouchers of the officers above specified, when approved, to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, and to retain in his office the duplicates, where they shall be open to public inspection at all times. Nothing contained in this act shall be deemed in any wise to diminish or affect the right of revision of the accounts to which this act applies by the accounting officers of the Treasury, as exercised under the laws now in force."

SEC. 2. That whenever the business of the courts in any judicial district shall make it necessary, in the opinion of the Attorney-General, for the marshal to furnish greater security than the official bond now required by law, a bond in a sum not to exceed $40,000 shall be given when required by the Attorney-General, who shall fix the amount thereof.

SEC. 3. That all acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SENER. Unless some gentleman desires to discuss this bill I will not say anything in relation to it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SENER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WESTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. SENER. I think now there will be no contest about the resolution in relation to the western district of Arkansas, and I ask leave to report it again.

The SPEAKER. Has the resolution been modified so as to embrace the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. HYNES?]

Mr. SENER. It has; I believe I am authorized by the committee to accept that amendment and I now report the resolution in a different form.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows.

Resolved, Than the Attorney-General be directed to institute a full and thorough judicial investigation into the character of allowances that have been paid at the Treasury Department as well as claims still due growing out of expenditures in the marshal's office of the western judicial district of Arkansas, since the 1st day of July, 1870, and that no part of said claims shall be paid until the Department has been satisfied by investigation of their correctness and the Department shall report its action to this House.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SENER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

GENEVA AWARD.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in regard to the Geneva award.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont to offer a substitute for the substitute reported by the committee, and then I move to recommit the bill.

Mr. POLAND. I offer what I send to the Clerk's desk as a substitute for the bill reported by the committee.

The Clerk read the proposed substitute, as follows:

That within sixty days after the passage of this bill the Attorney-General of the United States shall file in the circuit court of the United States, in the circuit to be designated by the President, a bill in equity, in the nature of a bill of interpleader, setting forth so much of the treaty between the United States and the government of Great Britain, called the treaty of Washington, as provides for the submission to arbitration of certain claims for damages, commonly called the "Alabama claims," the due appointment of commissioners thereunder, the making of the award thereon, and the payment thereof. The said bill shall also set forth whether any portion of said money paid upon said award is claimed by the Government of the United States for losses or damages to the same by the acts of the vessels named in the said award, and a concise statement of the facts, grounds, and amount of such claims. And all persons, companies, or corporations, who have already filed claims in the State Department for damages caused by the vessels, for and on account of which said award was made, shall be named as defendants in said bill, and that they claim severally to be entitled to portions of the said money, but the particulars of their several claims need not be set forth. And notice of the commencement and pendency of such bill shall be given by publishing the substance thereof in one public newspaper in each State and Territory for three months successively. And such notice shall state the day of filing such bill, and that every person, company, or corporation named therein as defendant, and also every person, company, or corporation claiming to be entitled to any part of said fund, and desiring to appear and become a party therein to assert such claim, is required to file an appearance therein within six months from the filing of such bill. And all and every person, company, or corporation, whether named as a defendant in said bill or not, who shall not enter an appearance therein within said six months, shall be forever barred of all right or claim in or to any part of said award.

SEC. 2. That every person, company, or corporation who shall, within six months after the filing of said bill, appear and claim to be entitled to any part of said award, shall be admitted as a party defendant therein; and within two months after the expiration of said six months every claimant to any part of said award, who has duly entered as a defendant in said cause, shall file in said court a written statement, giving concisely and clearly the facts and grounds of his claim, and the amount thereof: Provided, That those persons named as defendants and claimants in the bill may file such statement of their claims at any time after said bill is filed, and before the expiration of said six months, at their option.

SEC. 3. That immediately after the filing of such statement of claim by any claimant, the court shall fix a reasonable time for such claimant to take and file his evidence in support thereof, and shall allow the Government reasonable time to take and file evidence in opposition thereto, and any claimant shall be allowed to file evidence in opposition to any claim made by the United States to any part of such fund, and all testimony shall be taken in the manner and according to the practice of the court in equity causes, and all evidence, documents, and vouchers, filed in the State Department in support of any of such claims, shall be admissible in evidence in said cause.

SEC. 4. That when the evidence is closed upon any claim the court shall proceed to determine the same, and in all such adjudications the court shall be governed by the rules and principles established in courts of equity, and in allowing or disallowing costs shall follow the same rules.

SEC. 5. That whenever more than $5,000 of any claim shall be disallowed by the court, the claimant may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and whenever any claim exceeding $5,000 shall be allowed, the United States shall have the same right of appeal; and if any claim shall be allowed in favor of the United States, exceeding $5,000, any claimant, or any number of claimants jointly, may appeal therefrom; and all appeals shall be taken according to the law and rules governing appeals in equity from the circuit to the Supreme Court. Upon the allowance of any such appeal, it shall pass immediately to the Supreme Court for hearing, without awaiting the decision of other claims, and such appeal shall not delay proceedings in the circuit court upon other claims filed in the cause.

SEC. 6. That all appeals from the allowance or disallowance of such claims shall be entered at the term of the Supreme Court next after such appeal, and the Supreme Court shall give them precedence of other causes in said court, so far that they shall, if practicable, be heard at the term they are entered, and the decision of the Supreme Court shall be certified back to the court from which the appeal was taken.

SEC. 7. That whenever final judgment shall be rendered in the circuit court in favor of any claimant, a certified copy thereof shall be issued to the claimant, and a like copy be filed in the State Department.

SEC. 8. All claims allowed by said court in favor of the United States shall have priority, and be first paid out of said fund.

SEC. 9. That if the amount of all claims filed in said cause shall exceed the amount of said award, none of said judgments shall be paid until all the claims shall be adjudicated, and, if the amount of the judgments in favor of private claimants shall exceed the amount of said award, after deducting all claims allowed in favor of the United States, then the money remaining of said award shall be paid pro rata to such claimants, but if the amount of claims filed in said cause shall not exceed the amount of the award, after deducting the claims of the United States, or after so many of said claims shall have been finally disallowed that said fund will be sufficient to pay the remaining claims in full, and the same shall be made to appear by certificate from the court to the Secretary of State, in such case the Secretary of State, within six months after the certificate of a final judgment by the court in favor of any claimant has been duly filed, and no appeal has been taken therefrom, and no motion for a rehearing of the same has been filed, shall draw a warrant for the amount of such judgment, with 5 per cent. interest thereon from the time of the rendition thereof, in favor of the claimant therein, upon the Treasurer of the United States, and the Treasurer shall pay the same, and charge the amount against the bond or bonds held by the Secretary of State for the amount of said award.

Mr. TREMAIN. I ask the chairman of the committee to allow me to offer some amendments and to have them read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There cannot be any more amendments offered.

The SPEAKER. Not unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, I must object.

Mr. TREMAIN. I ask that the amendments may be printed in the RECORD of to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman's amendment in the nature of a substitute?

Mr. TREMAIN. No; there are several amendments proposing to strike out different portions of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have no objection to the amendments being printed.

The amendments offered by Mr. TREMAIN are as follows:

Page 12. Strike out all after the word "government," in line 12, to and including the words "Great Britain" in line 13, and insert the words "of Great Britain was held liable at Geneva."

Page 14. Strike out all after the word "who," in line 47, to and including the word "assured" in line 57, and insert in lieu thereof the words "have paid a loss thereon."

Page 14. Strike out lines 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, and 57.

Page 14. After the word "assured," in line 57, insert the words:

Provided also, That mutual insurance companies who have paid a loss shall be indemnified for the same, such indemnity to be apportioned among its members who contributed to pay such loss at the time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Before we go further I desire, in order that the House may know the order of business, to come to an agreement as to the course of this debate. This is a matter, as you are all aware, of great consequence, and there are many gentlemen who desire to discuss it. In order to give as full an opportunity for discussion as the state of public business will allow, after consulting with my associates on the committee and other gentlemen, I propose to call the previous question to-morrow at four o'clock, so that we may finish up the voting to-morrow night and that in the mean time there be a division of time between the opponents and friends of the bill substantially equally. I trust that that arrangement will meet with no objection.

Mr. TREMAIN. I have no objection to having it understood that a motion for the previous question will be made at four o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is the time at which I propose to move it.

Mr. TREMAIN. But unless I can have an opportunity to have a vote of the House on the amendments that I desire to offer, but which the chairman of the committee refuses to receive and will only allow an amendment to be offered by one of the friends of the bill, I am not to be understood as consenting that the previous question should be considered as ordered at that time. If my amendments can be received so that I can have a fair vote upon them in the House, I shall have no objection to the previous question being considered as ordered at four o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Of course if the House chooses it can vote down the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York proposes that if his amendments can be allowed to be considered as pending, the previous question shall be considered as operating at four o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am content with that arrangement.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that arrangement will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. Will all the time between now and to-morrow afternoon be devoted to the discussion of this question?

The SPEAKER. With the exception of one hour after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, which the House this morning assigned to the Committee on Ways and Means. With that exception there is nothing in the orders of the House to interfere with this discussion.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not want to interpose any objection that would hinder this bill; but the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is absent on a conference committee, and I think it was his understanding this morning, in accordance with some suggestions that had been made, that the debate would be brief on this bill and that it would be disposed of to-day.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The difficulty is that a great deal of this day has already been occupied.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It would seem to be rather limited time. But I suggest to the gentleman to name instead of four o'clock to-morrow——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, say three o'clock.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I would suggest two o'clock, and then we can be sure to get the subject out of the way to-morrow and permit the Committee on Appropriations the next day to take up the remaining appropriation bill, which has not yet been touched by the House.

The SPEAKER. With the amendments now pending, if the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to have the question disposed of to-morrow, the previous question should be considered pending a little earlier than four o'clock.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, say three o'clock.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That will be better.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the order just made; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

[Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Speaker, no more delicate and important subject is likely to challenge the attention of the Forty-third Congress than the just and proper distribution of the money received from Great Britain in payment of the Geneva award. The dignity and learning of the august tribunal by which that award was adjudged, the rank and power of the contending parties, the novelty of the precedent whereby causes of war were peacefully submitted to the arbitrament of an international court, the interesting nature of the momentous questions that were involved in the contest, and the forensic ability with which the claims of the sovereign litigants were maintained attracted to that tribunal the attention of the civilized world.

The United States were the victors in the litigation, but only because truth and justice were on their side. Our country has won imperishable honor and renown by its conduct in connection with that great moral and intellectual battle. This nation has earned and received the admiration and the eulogies of all other civilized nations for the magnanimity displayed by our statesmen, who, when our country was at the zenith of its power and had control of armies more powerful than any other nation, resisted the temptation to declare war, spared the blood and treasure of the people belonging to two of the principal nations of the earth, speaking a common language and springing from a common ancestry, and consented to establish a precedent whereby the interests of civilization and Christianity received a new and powerful impulse.

The Republic has received the meed of universal commendation for the exalted motives which prompted her action, for the diplomatic skill which preceded and culminated in the treaty of Washington, for the ability displayed by her legal advisers and representatives at Geneva, and for the crowning triumph which she won in the judgment of the court.

The proceedings of the court have been scattered broadcast among the nations and published in the various languages of Europe. They were events that transpired in the face of the world and commanded universal attention. The grounds on which our claims were presented and advocated, the arguments by which they were resisted, the nature and description of claims allowed, as well as the principles and matters of fact determined by the court, are also published and known, not only in England and America, but among all the jurists and peoples of continental Europe and of the civilized world.

That the record relating to the Geneva award, which is now so honorable to our country, may continue untarnished to the end of the chapter, it is necessary that the action of our Government in dealing with its own citizens should be characterized by the principles of justice and good faith. Our Government has no right to speak "with two tones to its voice," one at Geneva and another at Washington. If the arbitrators ordered Great Britain to pay to the United States the amount of the award to enable our Government to indemnify its citizens for certain losses, particularly recognized and included in the award, our Government is bound to distribute the money among those citizens who sustained those losses. It can only be withheld from the parties to whom in equity it belongs, whether it is retained in the Treasury or misappropriated by giving it to persons to whom it does not belong, by an exercise of unjustifiable arbitrary power.

This bill proposes to distribute the money, and declares to what persons it shall be paid. Having dissented from the majority of the Judiciary Committee who reported this bill, and having united in the minority report, it is due to myself and to the gravity of the questions involved that the reasons for my dissent and the grounds of my opinion should be presented to the House and to the country.

The Judiciary Committee are understood to have been unanimous in their conclusion that the money ought not to be retained in the Treasury, but should be distributed among the proper parties. Various opinions have been entertained and expressed as to the proper distribution of this fund, which may be classified as follows:

First. That it should be divided among those corporations and citizens who sustained losses by reason of the acts of those cruisers for which Great Britain was held liable, claims for which losses were allowed by the arbitrators and included in the award.

Second. That it should be divided among all the claimants for whose losses our Government made a demand of indemnity from England and presented the demand to the arbitrators, whether the claims were allowed or rejected, and whether the losses were caused by the cruisers for whose acts Great Britain was held responsible or any other confederate cruisers.

Third. That our Government holds the fund as absolute owner, free and clear from any trust or equities in favor of the parties who suffered losses, and has a legal and moral right to dispose of the money according to its own views of justice, either retaining it in the Treasury or placing it where it will do the most good.

Fourth. This bill excludes from participation in the award a large class of claimants whose losses were allowed by the arbitrators and included in the award, namely, the marine insurance companies excepting mutual companies, and includes among those who are to share in the fund a still larger class of claimants whose claims were rejected by the arbitrators, namely, the parties who paid war premiums, or, as they are named in the proceedings at Geneva, "enhanced rates of insurance."

This bill provides that all war premiums paid for war risks on vessels, cargoes, freights, or other property, after the sailing of either of the cruisers for whose acts our Government made claim upon the government of Great Britain, shall be paid out of the award, whether the persons suffered loss by capture or not. Under this bill, if such persons have received full indemnity from an insurance company for their loss, they may recover from this award the premium paid on account of the risk. It is not necessary that the persons paying the war premiums should show that they were paid on account of the sailing of the cruisers for whose acts Great Britain was held responsible, nor even on account of the sailing of the cruisers for whose acts our Government made any demand. It is enough that they were paid after the sailing of either of the latter class of cruisers.

Under this bill, no insurance company other than mutual which may have paid any losses, and been subrogated to the rights of the owners of property lost, can receive any indemnity for the loss, although the claim for such loss may have been allowed by the Geneva tribunal, no matter whether the owner shall have executed a formal assignment of his claim or otherwise. As if to brand any claim under an assignment to a marine insurance company as odious and void, the bill provides that no insurer shall have any claim under an assignment, although he may have paid the whole loss insured, unless the assignee also paid some other and additional consideration. As the bill had previously declared that no owner should have a claim for property lost where he had been insured and his insurance had been paid, and the bill had also cut off any claim by insurance companies under their equitable or legal assignments, the only effect of the provision annulling the assignment would seem to be to express the condemnation by Congress of an assignment which was condemned by no law when made, was entirely valid between the parties, was not complained of by the parties themselves, and which was sanctioned by the general usage among underwriters and parties insured.

Although the bill recognizes some sort of equities in favor of insurance companies other than mutual who have paid losses, yet it does not permit them to recover at all from the award the amount of such losses, although they may form part of the award, but requires the companies to exhibit an account of their business during the war, and to show that the war premiums received by them did not equal in amount the losses paid by them because of property destroyed by the cruisers. So that if they have actually paid losses to the amount of $5,000,000, which were allowed at Geneva, but their business shall show that during the four years of war their premiums received equaled their losses, they are wholly excluded from participating in the award. In taking this account, also, they are not allowed to be credited for the necessary expenses of carrying on their business, but the account must be confined to premiums received and losses paid.

To illustrate: if the insurance companies paid losses to the amount of $40,000 and received premiums during the war amounting to $40,000, they are excluded wholly, although their legitimate and necessary business expenses during that period may have amounted to $40,000.

Let us suppose, and the supposition is based upon an approximation to actual facts, that our Government presented at Geneva claims for property destroyed by the three cruisers for whose acts Great Britain was held responsible, amounting to $15,000,000. Among the vessels mentioned in this claim there are a number, amounting in value to say $5,000,000, which were insured, and the insurance companies had paid to the owners the full amount of the policies of insurance. The arbitrators allowed of this five millions the sum of, say, $4,500,000, and Great Britain has paid that sum to our Government to indemnify its corporations and citizens for these losses. Under the operation of this bill the following results are effected: First, the owners of these vessels are excluded from all participation in the award, and properly excluded, because they have been fully paid by the insurance companies for their losses, and if they were allowed to receive the amount from the fund they would be paid twice. Second, the insurance companies who paid the five millions are not allowed to share in the fund because on taking the account of their entire business during the war upon the imperfect basis established under this bill, wherein they are only credited with losses paid but not with the expenses of their business, it appears that their premiums received equaled their losses. If this were all it would appear that this $4,500,000 would remain in the Treasury. This would be bad enough, but yet the insurance companies who are the sufferers would have the consolation of reflecting that while their Government had not dealt justly by them, still their money had been applied perhaps to the construction of asylums or hospitals, or perhaps to the support of Government and the payment of taxes. But this bill leaves them no such crumbs of comfort. It includes among the sharers of the fund a new and large class of claimants who, as I shall have occasion to show, will absorb the balance of the fund. It brings in all the claims for which our Government made demand upon England. Our Government was a party to a great lawsuit, and could not recover for any claims that were not embraced in its complaint or case. For more abundant caution, and, as its representatives repeatedly declared, for the purpose of having a final and complete settlement of all pending difficulties, it embraced a large class of claims in its case which the proceedings show it never had any serious expectation would be allowed, and these claims were rejected by the tribunal. This bill proceeds upon the extraordinary theory that as between itself and its own citizens our Government is estopped from controverting its liability to pay all these claims to its own people. At the same time, where the court allowed a certain class of claims belonging to insurance companies, the Government is not estopped by the fact that it demanded these claims before the court and by the further facts that these claims were allowed and the money paid over by England and received by the United States upon such claims.

Nay, the bill proceeds upon the further ground that as to the claims that were not allowed they actually constitute equitable liens upon the fund itself. It would seem that it was enough to exclude these claims from being paid out of this fund that they never entered into or formed any part of the fund itself. If they were claims that our Government ought to pay, the proper and usual course would be to permit some appropriate committee of the House, or it may be a court of competent jurisdiction, to investigate the merits of the claims; but this bill, without any investigation whatever, declares not only that these are valid claims against the United States, but that they are liens upon this particular fund, and also that the court must order them to be paid without hearing or determining the question whether our Government is liable for their payment, and the further question whether they constitute liens in law or equity upon this particular award.

Before we determine by any act of legislation that any claims against the Government should be allowed and paid, every consideration of prudence, as well as the universal practice of the Government heretofore, requires that the amount of such claim should be ascertained. If this bill had simply authorized the payment of claims that had been allowed and paid, we should have been enabled to ascertain with a reasonable approximation to certainty the amount of such claims. This House has no evidence before it and no means of ascertaining otherwise the amount of demands for war premiums which this bill directs shall be paid out of this award. It appears by the recorded list of claims that had been filed with the Department of State prior to the determination of the Geneva tribunal, a copy of which I have obtained from the Secretary, that the amount of claims for increased insurance, exclusive of interest, was $6,146,219.71. But I learn on inquiry at the State Department that a large amount of additional claims has been since filed, and that new claims of that character are yet continually filed. It was stated before the committee by one of the war-premium claimants that the amount exclusive of interest of such claims would reach the sum of $10,000,000. It is stated by those who are well informed as to the extent of business of this description transacted by insurance companies that the amount of such claims with interest will far exceed the whole amount of the award. Should this bill become a law, it is a legislative recognition that our Government is liable to pay these claims. Should the fund prove inadequate to pay them all, it is difficult to discover on what ground the Government can hereafter refuse to pay the balance of such claims, nor why it should not also pay the interest thereon, inasmuch as the bill provides not merely for the payment of the principal but also for the payment of interest.

Having made this preliminary explanatory statement, I will proceed to call the attention of the House to two principal questions growing out of the bill, which I propose to discuss.

The first one is: Ought the claims for war premiums or increased insurance to be paid out of this fund, as provided for by this bill?

The second one is: Ought any of the insurance companies who have paid losses upon policies of insurance covering property destroyed by these cruisers, for whose acts Great Britain was held responsible, to be excluded from participation in this fund unless they can show by an account of their whole business during the war that the premiums received by them did not exceed the losses paid?

In considering the question whether claims for war premiums paid, or for enhanced insurance, as they are called in the papers relating to the treaty of Washington, should be paid from this fund, the first important and, as it seems to me, the controlling fact which should influence our action is, that the Geneva tribunal decided that according to the principles of international law Great Britain was not liable for such claims. This decision was the unanimous judgment of that tribunal, including our own commissioner, Charles Francis Adams, and it was duly entered upon the record of its proceedings.

When the American case was prepared and served upon the representatives of the English goverment in accordance with the provisions of the treaty, that government insisted that certain claims therein put forth were not included within the scope of the treaty. The treaty had provided for the submission of all the claims growing out of the acts committed by the Alabama and other vessels that had escaped under whatever circumstances from the British ports, and for the depredations committed by those vessels, and generically known as the Alabama claims.

On receiving the American case the British government raised the objection that the following claims for indirect losses were not embraced within the scope or intention of the reference to arbitration, namely:

First. The loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag.

Secondly. The enhanced payments of insurance.

Thirdly. The prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion.

England demanded that these claims should be withdrawn on that ground, and our Government declined to withdraw them, and insisted that they were covered by the treaty; that it was important that all pending differences between the two countries, relating to all the claims in question, should be determined, and persisted in its determination to submit these claims to the arbitrators. A long and sharp diplomatic correspondence ensued upon this subject, which will be found in volume 2, of the documents relating to the treaty.

No adjustment of this question having been arrived at, the arbitrators met at Geneva, in June, 1872, when our case and the American argument in support of it was presented. The English counsel asked for an adjournment to have the pending misunderstanding as to what claims were submitted determined. The tribunal having been informed of the points in difference, adjourned over until the following Monday for consultation on the American side.

Thereupon, when the arbitrators assembled on Monday, the following proceedings took place, as will appear by the authentic and official report, found in volume 2, of the documents, beginning at page 577:

No. 112.

Mr. Davis to Mr. Fish.

[Telegram.]

GENEVA, June 19, 1872. (Received 4.50 p. m.)

Tribunal will this morning make declaration reciting British motion for adjournment, and reasons given for making it, namely, the differences between the governments as to competency of tribunal to determine the three classes of indirect claims, and then continues:

"The arbitrators do not propose to express or imply any opinion upon the point thus in difference between the two governments as to the interpretation or effect of the treaty, but it seems to them obvious that the substantial object of the adjournment must be to give the two governments an opportunity of determining whether the claims in question shall or shall not be submitted to the decision of the arbitrators, and that any difference between the two governments on this point may make the adjournment unproductive of any useful effect, and after a delay of many months, during which both nations may be kept in a state of painful suspense, may end in a result which it is to be presumed both governments would equally deplore, that of making this arbitration wholly abortive. This being so, the arbitrators think it right to state that after the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations; and should, upon such principles, be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there were no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon. With a view to the settlement of the other claims, to the consideration of which by the tribunal no exception has been taken on the part of Her Britannic Majesty's government, the arbitrators have thought it desirable to lay before the parties this expression of the views they have formed upon the question of public law involved, in order that, after this declaration by the tribunal, it may be considered by the Government of the United States whether any course can be adopted respecting the first-mentioned claims which would relieve the tribunal from the necessity of deciding upon the present application of Her Britannic Majesty's government."

[Telegram.]

GENEVA, June 19, 1872. (Received at 6 p. m.)

The counsel write me as follows:

"We are of the opinion that the announcement this day made by the tribunal must be received by the United States as determinative of its judgment upon the question of public law involved, upon which the United States have insisted upon taking the opinion of the tribunal. We advise, therefore, that it should be submitted to, as precluding the propriety of further insisting upon the claims covered by this declaration of the tribunal, and that the United States, with a view of maintaining the due course of the arbitration on the other claims without adjournment, should announce to the tribunal that the said claims covered by its opinion will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration by the tribunal in making its award."

DAVIS.

No. 114.

Mr. Fish, to General Schenck.

[Telegram.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, June 22, 1872.

Send following by telegraph and also by mail, without delay, to Davis, Geneva:

"Your telegram of 19th informs me that the tribunal has made a declaration stating that the arbitrators have arrived at the conclusion that a class of the claims set forth in the case presented in behalf of the United States do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, a good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations, and should, upon such principles, be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making up its award.

"You also inform me that the counsel of this Government before the tribunal at Geneva have advised in writing that they are of opinion that the announcement thus made by the tribunal must be received by the United States as determinative of its judgment upon the question of public law involved, upon which the United States have insisted upon taking the opinion of the tribunal; that the counsel advise, therefore, that this judgment be submitted to as precluding the propriety of further insisting upon the claims covered by the declaration of the tribunal; and that the United States, with a view of maintaining the due course of arbitration on the other claims, without adjournment, should announce its opinion that the claims referred to by the tribunal will not be further insisted upon by the United States, and may be excluded from its consideration by the tribunal in making its award.

"I have laid your telegrams before the President, who directs me to say that he accepts the declaration of the tribunal as its judgment upon a question of public law which he had felt that the interests of both Governments required should be decided, and for the determination of which he had felt it important to present the claims referred to for the purpose of taking the opinion of the tribunal.

"This is the attainment of an end which this Government had in view in the putting forth of those claims. We had no desire for a pecuniary award, but desired an expression by the tribunal as to the liability of a neutral for claims of that character. The President, therefore, further accepts the opinion and advice of the counsel as set forth above, and authorizes the announcement to the tribunal that he accepts their declaration as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law upon which he had felt it his duty to seek the expression of their opinion; and that in accordance with such judgment and opinion, from henceforth he regards the claims set forth in the case presented on the part of the United States for loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag, the enhanced payment of insurance, and the prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war, and the suppression of the rebellion, as adjudicated and disposed of; and that consequently they will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, but are henceforth excluded from its consideration by the tribunal in making its award."

General Schenck to Mr. Fish.

[Telegram.]

LONDON, June 26, 1872. (Received at 11 a. m.)

Davis telegraphs as follows:

["Mr. Davis to Mr. Fish.]

"At the conference convened this day (June 25) by Count Sclopis, I said the declaration made by the tribunal, individually and collectively, respecting the claims presented by the United States for the award of the tribunal for, first, the losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag; second, the enhanced payment of insurance; and third, the prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion, is accepted by the President of the United States as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law involved. The agent of the United States is authorized to say that consequently the above-mentioned claims will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration in any award that may be made. To this Lord Tenterden replied: 'I will inform my government of the declaration made by the arbitrators on the 19th instant and of the statement now made by the agent of the United States, and request their instructions.' The tribunal then adjourned to Thursday at eleven, to enable him to communicate by telegraph with his government."

SCHENCK.

The hearing thereafter proceeded, and, as will hereafter be more fully stated, they made their award for the direct losses claimed by our Government. That these proceedings were regarded by our Government as the determination by the judgment of the proper tribunal that claims for war premiums were too remote and consequential to be recovered will fully appear from the letter of Secretary Fish to General Schenck, dated August 31, 1872.

No. 121.

Mr. Fish to General Schenck.

No. 260.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, August 31, 1872.

SIR: I have the pleasure to acknowledge your No. 290, inclosing two copies of the Queen's speech on the prorogation of the two Houses of Parliament on the 10th instant.

The telegram had enabled the public journals to bring to my notice this speech, or at least that part of it where Her Majesty is made to say that the declaration of the arbitrators at Geneva is entirely consistent with the views which she announced to Parliament at the opening of the session, and I had observed what you comment upon, that Her Majesty in her speech at the opening of the session had said: "In the case so submitted on behalf of the United States, large claims have been included which are understood on my part not to be within the province of the arbitrators." A very long correspondence ensued, in which this Government contended, in effect, that all the claims presented were within the proper jurisdiction of the tribunal, and that they could be disposed of only upon the judgment or award of the arbitrators. At their fifth conference, on 19th June, Count Sclopis, as president of the tribunal, on behalf of all the arbitrators made a statement, in the course of which he said: "The arbitrators think it right to state that after the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these claims," (referring to those which Her Majesty had thought were not within the province of the tribunal,) "they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations."

The president of the tribunal, in behalf of all the arbitrators, officially states that they had given "the most careful perusal" to "all that had been urged in respect of the claims"—this looks very much like taking cognizance of them; that after such perusal they had not only individually but "collectively" arrived at a "conclusion;" the "collective" action of a board must be official action.

The tribunal then, after taking cognizance of these claims, officially pronounces the opinion that upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases they do not constitute good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations. The president could regard this only as a definitive expression—a judgment of the tribunal upon the question of public international law applicable to such cases, deciding that claims for remote or consequential injuries do not constitute good foundation for compensation in damages between nations.

At the sixth conference (25 June) the agent of the United States stated that the declaration thus "made by the tribunal is accepted by the President of the United States as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law involved," and "that consequently the above-mentioned claims will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States." They had been insisted upon before the tribunal, but "will not be further insisted upon." The British agent then said that he would inform his government of the declaration made by the arbitrators on the 19th and of the statement now made by the agent of the United States, and request their instructions.

Thus advised that the President accepted the declaration of the tribunal as determinative of "their judgment upon the important question of public law involved," and that the United States would not further insist upon these claims before the tribunal, the British agent, acting under instructions from his government, assumed that the arbitrators would, upon such statement, think fit now to declare that the said several claims are, and from henceforth will be, excluded from their consideration, and would embody such declaration in their protocol of that day's proceedings. Upon this motion (as it would be called in a court of law) of the British agent, Count Sclopis, the presiding arbitrator, on behalf of all the arbitrators, then entered final judgment, declaring "that the said several claims for indirect losses mentioned in the statement made by the agent of the Unted States, on the 25th instant, and referred to in the statement just made by the agent of Her Britannic Majesty, are, and from henceforth shall be, wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal, and directed the secretary to embody this declaration in the protocol of this day's proceedings."

The protocols thus show that these claims, which Her Majesty was made to say to Parliament, on the 6th of February, were "understood, on her part, not to be within the province of the arbitrators," were by them taken into consideration; that the tribunal gave "the most careful perusal" to all that was urged on their behalf by the United States; that it pronounced its collective opinion upon their legal inadmissibility under the principles of international law as the foundation of an award of damages; that the United States declared their acceptance of this opinion as the judgment of the tribunal upon the question of public lwa involved, and expressed their willingness not to further insist upon the claims before the tribunal; that the arbitrators, upon the suggestion of the British agent, declared the claims now and from henceforth excluded from their consideration, and embodied in their protocol the declaration requested by the British agent.

If the claims had not been within the consideration of the tribunal, of what necessity the request to ask a formal order that they be "from henceforth wholly excluded?"

If they were not within the province of the arbitrators, why should the arbitrators give them consideration, or give the most careful perusal to what was urged in respect to them; or why should they express their individual and collective opinion with regard to them?

If not within "the province of the arbitrators," why should the British government, through instructions to its agent, and upon the statement of the agent of the United States that they will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal, ask for the entry of an order upon the protocol that they be "from henceforth wholly excluded from all consideration?"

I am, &c.,

HAMILTON FISH.

An erroneous impression seems to have prevailed to some extent that our Government waived the claims for war premiums in consideration of the benefits derived from the adoption of the three rules for the future government of neutrals which were secured by the treaty of Washington. A moment's reflection will show how groundless is this supposition. This is the language of the treaty on the point:

ART 6. In deciding the matters submitted to the arbitrators they shall be governed by the following three rules which are agreed upon by the high contracting parties as rules to be taken as applicable to the case, and by such principles of international law, not inconsistent therewith, as the arbitrators shall determine to have been applicable to the case:

RULES.

A neutral government is bound—

First, to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping within its jurisdiction of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use.

Secondly, not to permit either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men.

Thirdly, to exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

Her Britannic Majesty has commanded her high commissioners and plenipotentiaries to declare that Her Majesty's government cannot assent to the foregoing rules as a statement of principles of international law which were in force at the time when the claims mentioned in article 1 arose, but that Her Majesty's government, in order to evince its desire of strengthening the friendly relations between the two countries and of making satisfactory provision for the future, agrees that in deciding the questions between the two countries arising out of those claims, the arbitrators should assume that Her Majesty's government had undertaken to act upon the principles set forth in those rules.

And the high contracting parties agree to observe these rules as between themselves in future, and to bring them to the knowledge of other maritime powers, and to invite them to accede to them.

These rules prescribe the standard of liability for the government of neutrals, and declare what kind of negligence shall subject them to liability for damages. They leave, however, the question as to what damages shall be allowed for a violation of these rules to the principles of international law. And yet the Geneva tribunal acting under these rules adjudged that claims for war premiums paid were not recoverable according to international law. In other words, assuming the liability of Great Britain for negligence in suffering the cruisers to escape, yet claims for enhanced insurance were too remote and indirect to be allowed as damages for such negligence. In presenting these claims our Government had the benefit of the new rules, which the British government insisted, as the treaty shows, were more severe upon neutrals than the law of nations, and yet were yielded for the purpose of strengthening the friendly relations between the two governments.

If our Government had waived these claims as part of the treaty of Washington, where is the evidence of such waiver? If they had been waived the persistent enforcement of our right to have them submitted under the treaty, even at the hazard of having the treaty itself annulled by the refusal of Great Britain to proceed under it, was an act of perfidy on the part of our Government. Our able and accomplished Secretary of State was one of the commissioners who made the treaty, and yet he demanded with unyielding pertinacity that all these claims were embraced under the treaty and should be submitted.

This erroneous notion seems to be an exploded British scandal revived.

Sir Stafford Northcote, in a speech delivered at Exeter, May 17, 1872, advanced the extraordinary statement that the British commissioners, of whom he was one, had represented to their government that they understood a promise to be given that these claims were not to be put forward, and were not to be submitted to arbitration. He was alluding to the three classes of indirect claims to which I have already referred. But that there was in fact any such promise or understanding was so completely refuted, that I do not suppose it can again be renewed. The Marquis of Ripon denied any such understanding in a speech delivered in the House of Lords, June 5, 1872. All the American commissioners denied it in the fullest and most explicit terms, and the letters of Hamilton Fish, Samuel Nelson, Judge Hoar, Robert C. Schenck, and George H. Williams, covering the whole ground, will be found in part 2, volume 2, of the documents. Finally Sir Stafford himself, in a letter to Lord Derby withdrew the charge in substance, by admitting that he only had drawn an inference from a statement by the American commissioners, but that the British commissioners never for one moment thought of relying upon it or upon any other matter outside of the treaty itself.

It thus appears that the claims for war premiums were rejected by the Geneva tribunal upon grounds that are entirely fatal to their validity. On what possible ground can they be paid out of the Geneva award?

We are told that they should be paid because our Government is liable for them, and that liability can neither be discharged nor affected by the action of the Geneva arbitration. It would be a sufficient answer to say that if this were correct, yet as they formed no part of the claims which were embraced in the award they have no place in this bill, but should be left, as all other claims against the Government are left, to be investigated by the proper committees or tribunals, and thus become recognized as demands to be paid out of the Treasury.

But I controvert each and every part of the argument by which it is sought to hold our Government liable for these war premiums. The theory of the claimants is this: The Government owes protection to its citizens in return for the allegiance the citizen owes to the Government. The citizens have a valid claim against the Government for losses sustained upon the sea, including war premiums, and therefore these claims should be embraced in this bill. The claimants are under the necessity of rejecting the theory that they had valid claims for the war premiums against Great Britain, because the tribunal rejected such claims, and because also the confederate cruisers, other than those for whose acts Great Britain was held liable, or was in fact liable, swarmed the seas, and the war premiums may have been paid as much on account of exposure to their depredations as to the acts of the three vessels for whose acts Great Britain was responsible.

Waiving the conclusive argument that the claimants have no right to this fund because the tribunal rejected their claims, let us inquire whether either Great Britain or our Government is liable for claims of this character.

Our Government is not liable, for they belong to those losses arising from war, for which citizens have no claim for indemnity against their own Government. If any authority for recognizing such claims on the part of the Government can be found in any of the writings of the publicists of Europe or America, it has not fallen under my observation. If any case can be found in the history of the civilized world where a Government has paid such claims to its citizens, it has yet to be produced in support of these claims. The allowance of such claims, or claims of a kindred character growing out of war, would destroy the resources, ruin the treasury, and annihilate the credit of any nation.

If such claims are valid, why is not the Government liable for the bounties paid to procure soldiers by citizens, towns, and cities? Why not liable for the enhanced cost of food, clothing, and all the necessaries of life paid by our citizens in consequence of war? Why not for the increased taxes, for the pecuniary losses arising from the killed who were the support of parents, wives, and children? Where shall the line be drawn?

Claims for war premiums have far less foundation than most of the losses I have named. The merchant or owner of a vessel and cargo who paid his war premium received his consideration. He got his policy of insurance, and went to bed with the knowledge that if his vessel was destroyed that night, he had a sure indemnity promised by the insurance company. The premium was voluntarily paid for a good consideration. The amount of his insurance and of the corresponding premium depended upon his own will and pleasure, and the Government had nothing to do with it. Such losses are not, I submit, and never were the proper subjects of indemnity.

Hear the language of Vattel:

There are damages caused by inevitable necessity; as for instance the destruction caused by the artillery in retaking a town from an enemy. These are merely accidents. They are misfortunes which chance deals out to the proprietors on whom they happen to fall.

The sovereign ought indeed to show an equitable regard for the sufferers if the situation of his affairs will admit of it; but no action lies against the state for misfortunes of this nature for losses which she has occasioned, not willfully, but through necessity and by mere accident, in the exertion of her rights. The same may be said of damages caused by the enemy. All the subjects are exposed to such dangers, and woe to him on whom they fall! The members of a society may well encounter such risk of property, since they encounter a similar risk of life itself. Were the state strictly to indemnify all those whose property is injured in this manner, the public finances would soon be exhausted, and every individual in the state would be obliged to contribute his share in due proportion; a thing utterly impracticable. Besides, these indemnifications would be liable to a thousand abuses, and there would be no end of the particulars. It is therefore to be presumed that no such thing was ever intended by those who united to form a society. (Book 3, chapter 15, section 232, page 403.)

If the government is liable for war premiums paid, the business of those who own ships at sea and are engaged in maritime commerce during war is far from being uncertain and hazardous, as is generally assumed. The merchant or ship-owner may send forth his vessels to the ends of the earth. He may procure policies of insurance for the full value of the ships and of their outgoing and incoming cargoes. If they are destroyed, he receives indemnity from the companies. If they escape the perils of war and bring their rich cargoes home, the enhanced values of such cargoes by reason of the war increase the profits and fill the coffers of the merchant. Whether they are destroyed or not, upon the return of peace his war premiums must be refunded to him with interest by his government.

That these indirect claims were not regarded by our Government as having a very substantial foundation is apparent from the correspondence now made public. They had been advanced during the excitement arising out of our difficulties with England. It was deemed necessary that all pending controversies between the two countries should be settled. They were embraced within the broad language of the treaty, and hence were claimed.

But Secretary Fish, himself an eminent jurist, and aided by the advice of the best publicists of America, thus speaks of these claims in his letter to General Schenck of April 23, 1872.

Neither the Government of the United States nor so far as I can judge, any considerable number of the American people, have ever attached much importance to the so-called "indirect claims," or have ever expected or desired any award of damage on their account. (Volume 2, part 2, page 477.)

He adds:

The United States are sincere in desiring a "tabula rasa" on this Alabama question, and therefore they desire a judgment upon them by the Geneva tribunal.

The principle established by the Geneva tribunal that there is no liability for such remote damages will be of value to us as a neutral nation in future wars; but we cannot claim the benefit of it, if by our example in dealing with our own citizens, we recognize and pay such claims.

Mr. Fish observes in the same letter:

It is not the interest of a country situate as are the United States, with their large extent of sea-coast, a small navy, and smaller internal police, to have it established that a nation is liable in damages for the indirect, remote, or consequential results of a failure to observe its neutral duties. This Government expects to be in the future, as it has been in the past, a neutral much more of the time than a belligerent.

It is my misfortune not to have learned with certainty whether the claimants for war premiums proceed upon the ground that they had a claim against Great Britain because they paid the war premiums on account of her neglect, or whether it is put upon the ground that our Government is bound to indemnify them for losses growing out of the war without reference to the liability of Great Britain. The bill seems to assume a double aspect in this regard.

The second section provides for paying all war premiums paid after the sailing of the vessels for whose acts the Government made demand. If the Government is liable without reference to Great Britain, why not go back to the commencement of the war? If the liability depended upon the actual negligence of Great Britain, why refer to the claims made for the acts of that large fleet of cruisers for whose acts Great Britain was held not responsible at all?

The actual depredations were perpetrated by many cruisers for whose acts Great Britain was not held responsible, and for whose acts, so far as we have any evidence before us, she ought not to have been held responsible; for in the absence of any additional evidence before us we should regard the decision as correct in its conclusions upon matters of fact.

The bill does not limit the war premiums to be paid to those which were paid in consequence of the neglect of Great Britain in suffering vessels to escape. It is doubtless true that war premiums were paid in consequence of the war with the confederates, and with the knowledge that confederate cruisers were afloat and liable to increase. But it is wholly unwarranted to assume that such war premiums were paid solely because of the escape of the cruisers for whose acts England was held liable, or, indeed, for the acts of the cruisers for whose acts our Government made demand. I understand the fact to be that the Sumter ran out of New Orleans before the Alabama was built, and destroyed seventeen vessels. This alone was enough to explain the payment of war premiums. The Nashville also, it is understood, ran out of Charleston and destroyed some vessels before the Alabama escaped. Of the nine cruisers afloat, England was only held liable for the acts of two, and for the third after she left Melbourne. This act assumes that war premiums paid on account of the existence of these nine cruisers are properly chargeable to a fund paid by Great Britain solely on account of the acts of these three.

But on what principle are war premiums paid after the sailing of the vessels for whose acts our Government made a claim to be considered as entitled to payment out of this award? The claim was made for more abundant caution, so as to have every demand included. It was intended to give all our citizens who had lost a chance for recovery. It was for the purpose of securing a final settlement. The circular of our Government providing for the presentation of these claims simply stated that they would be submitted to the tribunal for its judgment concerning their merits. On what principle of law or equity does our Government become responsible for the claims which it presented and which were disallowed?

The same objection applies to the first section of the bill which provides for paying all owners of property destroyed by any confederate cruisers for whose acts our Government made claims upon Great Britain, including not merely the Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah, but also including the Retribution, the Georgia, the Sumter, the Nashville, the Tallahassee, or Chickamauga, and the Shenandoah before she left Melbourne, for all which Great Britain was held irresponsible, but for which by this bill our Government is made liable, or the fund is held liable, because our Government in its paternal kindness made an unsuccessful claim upon Great Britain.

But I maintain that neither by the principles of international law, the common law, the civil law, nor any other law which should be recognized as binding upon Congress, are claims for war premiums paid allowable as damages, for the reason that they are too remote and indirect; and of course if this is sound doctrine, then it is wholly immaterial on what ground such claims are included in this bill. They fall within that elementary rule of damages so familiar to the legal profession, that only such damages are recoverable as are the direct, immediate, necessary result of the act. These are altogether remote, indirect, and consequential.

To illustrate: It is a familiar principle of the law of nations that if an English man-of-war should fire into and destroy an American vessel at sea in time of peace, the owner of such vessel might apply to his government for redress. In case his government should fail on demand to secure indemnity from the English government, it might lawfully issue for the benefit of the sufferer letters of marque and reprisal to seize English vessels and obtain satisfaction for his loss.

Suppose the loser of the vessel should after the destruction of his ship procure policies of insurance upon his other vessels and through fear pay large premiums to become insured against similar losses, would England be liable for those premiums? Could our Government issue letters to obtain satisfaction for them?

By the common law the hundred, and by the statute law of most of our States, cities, and counties are held liable for the acts of a mob or riot. Suppose the owner of several houses loses one of them by fire caused by rioters. The next day he procures, through fear of further destruction, ample policies of insurance upon his other buildings. Could he recover the premiums paid from the city or county? And yet that case is stronger than the present, because here the Government is not liable either for the acts of the confederate cruisers or for the negligence of the British government. Take a case of contract. A principal sends an agent upon a traveling tour and promises to pay his necessary expenses and a salary. Through fear that he may lose his life or limb, the agent procures at every railroad office a life-policy during his trip for such amount as he deems his life worth. Can he recover the premiums from his employer?

This bill is singularly inconsistent in the inequality with which it treats different classes of claimants. Insurance companies have paid losses upon vessels destroyed, and the owners have assigned to them all claims against any and all persons and governments by reason of such losses. These losses are allowed by the Geneva tribunal, and the amounts are embraced in the award. This bill declares that such insurance companies shall have no part of this fund, unless they shall make up an account of all their business during the war, charging on one side the premiums received and crediting on the other losses paid, and show that the balance is against them. How differently are those treated who paid premiums but whose claims were rejected at Geneva! A merchant at New York, Boston, or Portland sends out after the war broke out ten ships to bring back the rich and costly products of China or other countries of the East. He keeps the ships and their cargoes fully insured against war risks. In due time they return laden with their precious cargoes, and by reason of the war the profits of the merchant upon these goods are vastly enhanced. After paying all his expenses, war premiums and all, he clears $100,000 profits, whereas except for the war his profits would only have been $50,000. This bill regards him with such special favor that he is not required to make up any account of his business and show a loss, but he must be repaid all his war premiums at all events. If half his vessels had been destroyed and the insurance companies had indemnified him for their value, this bill gives him the premiums paid upon the vessels lost as well as the vessels saved. I allude to this not to justify the rule that is applied to the insurance companies, but to show how the rule varies in its application to different classes of losses.

There should be no discrimination between different classes of claimants for the fund, and least of all should there be any discrimination against those whose losses make up partly the award and in favor of those whose claims were rejected and formed no part of the award.

Why is this preference awarded to those who have claims for war premiums? It has been said that they were poor persons and that they constitute a very numerous class. Is there one law for the rich and another for the poor? Is justice a respecter of persons? Must one rule of distribution prevail as to corporations and another as to natural persons? It would not appear from the claims filed before the award was made that they were either very numerous or very poor.

The claims for "enhanced payments of insurance," called "war premiums," presented to the tribunal at Geneva for allowance under the treaty of Washington amounted to over $6,000,000.

An examination of the "revised list of claims" shows that this amount was claimed as follows:

4 persons or firms, described as of Providence, Rhode Island, claimed	$30,630 13
4 persons or firms described as of three different places in Connecticut, (one for over half, being in fact from New York,) claimed	113,469 84
11 persons or firms, described as of Concord and Portsmouth, New Hampshire, claimed	107,137 43
77 persons or firms, described as of different places in Maine, claimed	397,168 99
105 persons or firms, described as of different places in Massachusetts, (chiefly Boston, New Bedford, and Salem)	2,948,675 41
201 persons or firms thus claimed	3,597,082 10
128 persons or firms of New York claimed	2,400,646 18
12 persons or firms south and west of New York, namely, 2 in Philadelphia, 2 in Baltimore, and 8 in California	247,655 11
341 persons or firms thus claimed	6,245,383 39
Average claim	18,341 00

Inasmuch as it is from and on behalf of these claimants for "war premiums" that most if not all the opposition to the claims of the insurance companies emanates, it may be of importance to notice the extraordinary concentration of these claims in a few hands.

The "revised list of claims" shows that David Ogden, J. Nickerson, and Barling & Davis, of New York, and W. W. Crapo and Bradford & Folger, of New England, were the principal agents to get up and forward these claims.

The amounts represented by them, respectively, are shown to be as follows:

D. Ogden	$971,559 74
J. Nickerson	354,496 58
Barling & Davis	271,636 87
W. W. Crapo	726,553 68
Bradford & Folger	1,364,913 06
Total	3,689,159 93

When the claims for war premiums were rejected at Geneva, it would seem as if all possible ground of claim on their part upon the award had disappeared. I have a letter written by a firm who had filed claims for war premiums to the amount, I believe, of about $150,000, taking this very sensible view of the case. They write to the attorneys for an insurance company as follows:

NEW YORK, January 8, 1874.

DEAR SIRS: We have your letter of 30th ultimo, and would say in reply to its first paragraph that we have no recollection of receiving from the Atlantic Insurance Company a letter or certificate of the amount of war premiums paid by our firm. To the direct questions you ask we reply that we are not now taking any active steps for the maintenance or enforcement of claims for the amount of the war premiums, and that we have not executed any assignment of our claims, but did make a bargain with W. W. Crapo, C. A. Tucker, and George O. Crocker, of New Bedford, for allowing to them and their associates or assigns a percentage upon what might be received from these claims, and at the same time gave them an irrevocable power of attorney, dated December 27, 1871, to prosecute, secure, collect, and receive our claims arising out of the payment of extra insurance premiums during the war of rebellion.

After the decision of the Geneva board of arbitration, disallowing the claims for war premiums, we supposed that all chance of our recovering anything for those claims was ended, and the idea of making an allowance to claimants of this character, by means of taking away from the insurance companies the amounts allowed by the Geneva board in satisfaction of their direct claims for losses of ships and cargoes vested in them as assignees, by abandonment or otherwise of the claims of the original parties, is an idea which certainly never would have occurred to us.

If, however, the action of Congress should be such as to result in transferring a portion of the Geneva award to the war-premium claimants, we should of course claim the allowance to ourselves as made to others standing in like position.

Yours, very respectfully,

GRINNELL, MINTURN & CO.

Messrs. MOORE & HAND.

The claimants for war premiums must be deemed to have presented these claims not as demands against the United States, but as claims against Great Britain. The circular issued by the Secretary of State requiring the presentation of these claims distinctly notified the claimants that the claims to be filed in the State Department were to be presented as claims against Great Britain, and if claims were presented against the United States they were to be filed in other Departments. The following is the language of the circular which issued from the State Department to claimants, dated September 22, 1865, and also of the letter from the Secretary, dated in 1871, giving instructions to claimants:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 22, 1865.

Citizens of the United States having claims against foreign governments, not founded on contract, which may have originated since the 8th of February, 1853, will, without any delay which can be avoided, forward to this Department statements of the same, under oath, accompanied by the proper proof.

* * * * * * *

It is proper that the interposition of this Government with the foreign government against which the claim is presented should be requested in express terms to avoid a possible objection to the jurisdiction of a future commission on the ground of the generality of the claim. Claims of citizens of the United States against this Government, growing out of the late insurrection, are under the cognizance of other Departments, of the Court of Claims, or are the subjects for an appeal to Congress.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September —, 1871.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the —— instant, and its inclosures.

In reply, I inclose a copy of the treaty concluded with Great Britain on the 8th of May last and general instructions as to the proof of claims prepared for the use of claimants in the absence of rules by the tribunal which may pass upon the claims.

In the absence of rules and in anticipation of the action of the tribunal, this Department cannot assume to determine what claims it may or may not be proper to prefer under the first eleven articles of the treaty, nor to direct what form or extent of proof will be necessary to establish them, nor the effect of insurance upon the question of right of compensation. It will present to the tribunal at Geneva, to be taken into account in estimating the sum to be paid to the United States, all "claims growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the Alabama claims" which may be presented to the Department in time to enable it to do so. Persons desiring to lodge claims in the Department for that purpose are requested to do so without delay, in such form and sustained by such proofs as they may be advised or think proper to rest their claims upon, as the time for presenting the case of the United States expires on the 16th day of December next.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary.

There is another very serious objection to the provision of this bill which allows all war premiums to be paid, and that is, that double payment of many such premiums is allowed. A large portion of the business of marine insurance, perhaps indeed the bulk of such business, was transacted under what are known as open policies. The practice among the insurance companies of the city of New York, and I presume the same prevails in all other companies in this country, is that when a loss is suffered of a vessel or cargo covered by an open policy the underwriters pay to the assured as one of the items of his loss the premium paid for the insurance. According to this bill the assured will be entitled to recover back those premiums whether loss or destruction ensued or not, and thus the assured in case of loss receives his premiums twice—once from the insurers, and again from this award. So, too, in the case of a limited policy when the value of a vessel was insured, the amount paid for premium was by the practice of the parties included in the valuation, so that in case of loss the owner received back his premium paid.

For the reasons thus imperfectly presented I am brought to the conclusion that claims for war premiums ought not to be included in this bill providing for a distribution of the Geneva award. Every dollar paid out of that fund to those to whom it does not belong is a diversion of the fund from its proper objects. If it shall be paid out by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, passing upon the merits of the claims in an action wherein the United States and the claimants are parties, such judgment will be res adjudicata and final and conclusive. But the Government cannot relieve itself from its equitable obligations to pay the true owners by anything less than such a judgment, by the release or other voluntary act of the parties, or by accord and satisfaction. No law enacted by the Government which is merely its own act can discharge the claim that exists in favor of the true owners. They will come to Congress again and again, and unless their claims are ultimately paid they will remain a standing and perpetual memorial of the injustice with which this Government treats its own citizens.

The remaining question presented for our consideration is, whether the insurance companies shall be excluded from participation in the award, as they are practically excluded under this bill, excepting mutual companies?

What are the claims of these companies, and on what legal and equitable grounds do they stand? A large number of the vessels and cargoes destroyed for which claims were presented and allowed by the Geneva award were insured and the owners had been paid for their losses by the companies according to the contracts of insurance. The money cannot be paid to the owners. If it is not paid to the underwriters, the Government holds it without any other ownership to it than its own.

By the contract of marine insurance the company becomes the surety against loss for the owner, and in case of loss, like any other surety, becomes entitled to stand in the place of the creditor. The company succeeds to all the rights of the owner, including the right to recover the vessel if restored and all moneys recovered on account of its loss or destruction.

The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly adjudged that the insurer is such surety and entitled to such right of subrogation or substitution. This is the universal rule of equity jurisprudence applicable to such a contract. Story speaks of this doctrine as derived from the civil law, and as belonging to an age of enlightened policy and refined though natural justice. He says:

A surety paying the creditor was entitled to a cession of the debt and a subrogation or substitution to all the rights and actions of the creditor against the debtor. (1 Story's Equity Jurisprudence, section 635.)

The Supreme Court of the United States held in Hall & Long vs. Railroad Companies, (13 Wallace's Reports, 367,) that—

The insurer stands practically in the position of a surety; he is entitled to all the means of indemnity which the satisfied owner held against the party primarily liable. Hence it has often been held that an insurer who has paid a loss may use the name of the assured in an action to obtain redress. * * * It is conceded that this doctrine prevails in cases of marine insurance.

The principle of subrogation seems to have been uniformly applied, according to the decisions of our courts, to cases where moneys have been received by our Government from a foreign government as indemnity for insured property destroyed at sea. It rests upon the plainest principles of natural justice. If the insurer is not entitled to the indemnity it would follow that no one is entitled to it, because the owner has already been indemnified by the payment of his loss under the contract of insurance.

In the early case of Gracie vs. The New York Insurance Company, the insured property had been captured and condemned by the courts of France, and the question was whether the damages against the insurance company should be mitigated by reason of the possibility that France might afterward make payment of the loss. Chief Justice Kent, the illustrious American jurist, in deciding the case recognizes all the principles involved in the present case, when he says:

If France should at any future period agree to and actually make compensation for the capture and condemnation in question, the Government of the United States, to whom the compensation would in the first instance be payable, would become trustee for the party having the equitable title to the reimbursement; and this would clearly be the defendants (who are the insurers) if they should pay the amount.

The learned chancellor recognized the practice of civilized nations to act through their several governments in making compensation to the citizens of each nation, and was not educated in the doctrine that the government receiving the indemnity did not hold it as trustee but as absolute owner, although the nation making the payment should not declare that the money was paid to the government receiving it as trustee.

Seventy-four years ago the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Symonds vs. Union Insurance Company, (4 Dallas's Reports, 417,) said:

The allegation of abandonment in case of loss is an inseparable incident to the right of insurance; and upon an abandonment the underwriters acquired all the rights of the insured.

In Rhinelander vs. The Insurance Company of Pennsylvania, (4 Cranch's U. S. Reports, 29,) the same court discusses the law of marine insurance, and Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the court, says:

When a loss is real, a controversy can only arise as to the fact. When not so, there may be for the time a total loss, and in this state of things the insured may abandon to the underwriter, who stands in his place, and to whom justice is done by enabling him to receive all that the insured might receive.

One of the most striking decisions upon this subject is reported in 1 Peters, 193. It is the case of Comegys vs. Vasse, wherein Judge Story discusses this whole subject with his accustomed learning and exhaustive research.

The case is in many respects similar to the present, differing however widely in this, that when our Government received the indemnity it did not pay it over to other parties on the theory that it was the absolute owner, but paid it to the insurer, to whom it equitably belonged.

Vasse, being a marine insurer of vessels at sea which were seized and carried into Spanish ports, had paid the loss to the owners in 1802. In 1819 Spain had paid to the United States money which had been awarded by commissioners appointed under a treaty between the United States and Spain, and the United States paid the money over to Vasse, the insurer. A controversy arose as to the character of Vasse's ownership of the money, and the question is determined in this emphatic language of the court:

The law gives to the act of abandonment to underwriters, when accepted, all the effects which the most accurately drawn assignment would accomplish. The underwriter then stands in the place of the assured, and becomes legally entitled to all that can be recovered from destruction. It is clear that the right to compensation for damages and injuries to which citizens of the United States were entitled, and which, under the treaty with Spain, were to be subjects of compensation, passed by abandonment to the underwriters upon property which had been seized or captured.

England was defended before the Geneva tribunal by her most eminent, learned, and accomplished lawyers, and these gentlemen fully admitted the right of the insurance companies to be subrogated when such admissions were adverse to the interests of their Government. The language of the British counsel is as follows:

COUNTER-CASE OF GREAT BRITAIN.

The American insurance companies, who have paid the owners as for a total loss, are, in our opinion, entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the latter, according to the well-known principle that an underwriter who has paid, as for a total loss, acquires the rights of the assured in respect of the subject-matter of insurance. This principle was explained and acted on in the well-known English cases of Randall vs. Cochran (1 Vessey, sr., 98,) and The Quebec Fire Insurance Company vs. Saint Louis, (7 Moore, P. C., 286,) and is well recognized by the courts of America.

On the other hand, it is equally clear that the underwriters cannot be entitled to anything more than the assured themselves; for the claim of the former is founded on nothing else than their title to be subrogated to the rights which the latter possessed, and which therefore cannot possibly be more extensive than the claim which the latter would be entitled to maintain.

From these considerations two consequences follow: in the first place, where the claimant is the insurance company and not the owners, compensation cannot be due for any sum exceeding the amount of the actual loss sustained by the owner, however much that sum may fall short of the amount paid by the company by reason of the property having been overinsured. In the second place, wherever the owner puts forward a claim for his loss at the same time that the insurance company also claims the money paid by them in respect to the same loss, such a double claim must at once be absolutely rejected, since to allow it would be in effect to sanction the payment of the loss twice over.

In an able argument before the United States Senate, in 1835, Daniel Webster said:

There is no more universal maxim of law and justice throughout the civilized and commercial world than that an underwriter who has paid a loss on ship or merchandise to the owner is entitled to whatever may be received from the property. His right accrues by the very act of payment; and if the property or its proceeds be afterward recovered in whole or in part, whether the recovery be from the sea, from captors, or from the justice of foreign states, such recovery is for the benefit of the underwriter. Any attempt, therefore, to prejudice these claims on the ground that many of them belong to insurance companies or other underwriters is at war with the first principles of justice. (Webster's Works, volume 4, page 156.)

The steamboat Robert Campbell, jr., an insured vessel, was impressed by the United States into the military service and lost, and the question of the right of the insurance companies which had paid the loss was presented to Attorney-General Hoar. His opinion in favor of the companies is in the thirteenth volume of the Opinions of the Attorneys-General. He says:

The principles on which the following cases were decided by the Supreme Court establish, I think, the right of the insurance companies to receive from the United States in the place of the owners who were insured whatever amount of money, less than the value of the steamer and now remaining unpaid, those companies have paid the owners under their policies, and which the owners would otherwise be entitled to receive. (Comegys et al. vs. Vasse, 1 Peters, 193; Carpenter vs. Providence Washington Insurance Company, 16 Peters, 495; Gallison vs. The Memphis Insurance Company, 19 Howard, 312.)

That the Geneva award embraces compensation allowed for the destruction of property which had been insured and paid for by insurance companies to the amount of more than $4,000,000 is clearly established by the papers relating to the treaty of Washington. After the tribunal had decided for the acts of which vessels England was liable, and had eliminated all improper claims for indirect damages, the ascertainment of the direct damages was a matter capable of easy solution. The agents and counsel of the United States presented schedules showing the names of the vessels destroyed by each one of the three guilty cruisers or their tenders, with the value of the vessels, cargoes, and other claims, such as wages, &c., as claimed. They also laid before the tribunal the claims which had been filed with the Government by insurance companies and owners, in pursuance of the notice published by the Government calling upon all the citizens to present the same with the affidavits and proofs showing such loss and the value of the property.

No question was made as to the names of the vessels destroyed or the facts of the destruction. The aggregate amount of the claims was $14,437,000. The counsel for Great Britain presented a counter-statement, containing the list of the same vessels, but challenging the amount and items of damages claimed, and admitting damages for the destruction of the property mentioned to the amount of $7,464,764. Count Staempfli, one of the arbitrators, at the request of the tribunal, prepared from these opposing schedules a synoptical table, showing an aggregate amount, according to the arbitrators' principles, of about $12,000,000. Interest was allowed for about ten years, and the sum of $15,500,000 was awarded.

I have in my possession two tables which I will have printed with my remarks; the first one showing the names of the vessels destroyed with the name of the cruiser by which such vessel was destroyed, the items claimed by the United States, the amounts directly opposite which were allowed by the British counsel, and in the third column the estimated sum allowed by applying the principles, which were promulgated by the arbitrators.

The second table, contains the names of the vessels included in the first list which were insured, and the amount of such insurance, as appears by the claims filed and presented to the Geneva tribunal.

It will appear from these tables that the whole number of vessels destroyed for which compensation was included in the award was one hundred and twenty-nine; of which number it also appears that insurance had been effected and paid upon eighty-nine vessels.

The aggregate amount of such insurance was $4,865,832.62, of which the mutual insurance companies owned $3,078,520.87, and the stock insurance companies owned $1,787,311.75.

The bill recognizes the claims of the insurance companies but practically excludes them by the extraordinary condition-precedent as to stock companies, which requires that before receiving any portion of the award they shall—

Show by an exhibit of their books of account and business or otherwise that the war premiums actually received by them did not equal in amount the losses paid by them because of property thereafterward captured and lost or destroyed by either or all of said cruisers.

It will not be presumed that any company can comply with this condition, for they would not be likely to carry on the business which did not yield income enough from premiums, their only source of revenue, to pay their expenses, and this account takes no note of such expenses. The result of this will be that the companies are despoiled of the moneys allowed and included in the Geneva award for their indemnity.

Independent of the want of any good reason for requiring this account, there is a very great if not insuperable difficulty in taking such an account. The rates of insurance were varying from day to day according to the supposed risks. I have a letter from the president of one of the largest companies in New York showing that the premiums for war risks and for ordinary marine risks were not separated. His letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, April 1, 1874.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiry of this date I have to say, that in probably nineteen cases out of twenty of insurance against capture during the late war insurance was obtained at the same time and in the same policy against the ordinary perils of the sea, and it was not customary to designate any portion of the premium charged for such insurance as applicable to the war risk.

In other words, the ordinary and usual course for parties desiring insurance against capture was to take out a policy covering all the perils of the sea with the risk of capture included, and for such a policy a certain premium was charged. What portion was charged by reason of the indemnity against capture the insured did not know, and no underwriter to-day could state with certainty or estimate with much accuracy in any given case.

The only exceptions were where insurance was sought against capture only, of which the instances were few, chiefly at the end of the war; and in these cases only could the amount of the so-called "war-premium" be ascertained with any reasonable certainty.

This I believe covers the ground.

Yours, truly,

J. D. JONES,
President Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company.

Why are insurance companies thus condemned to outlawry by this bill? The theory seems to be this: The award is not held by the United States in trust, but it was allowed for national losses, and is properly held by the Government as absolute owner, with full right to dispose of it according to its sovereign pleasure; and it would not be just to pay over any part of it to those companies that actually were enabled to make a livelihood out of their business during the war.

I challenge this theory in its law, its statement of fact, and its view of justice. The award was not allowed for national losses. Excepting two or three ships chartered by the United States, provision for paying for which is properly made in this bill, not one dollar was allowed for national losses, but the award was made on account of losses sustained by the private corporations and citizens of the United States, and given to the United States to enable it to indemnify such losses, and for which claims had been filed and presented. I have already shown that money received under such circumstances has been always adjudged by the courts to be money held in trust.

What is meant by the claim that this award was for national losses? No claim was made for pecuniary compensation on account of offended pride, national insult, or wounded honor. It is to be hoped that our Government was too proud and noble to ask for money on these grounds. The expression of regret contained in the treaty on the part of England because their cruisers were suffered to escape from British ports was a far more grateful atonement than gold or silver. All the claims that were made were thus stated by the American Commissioners:

The claims, as stated by the American commissioners, may be classified as follows:
1. The claims for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the insurgent cruisers.
2. The national expenditures in the pursuit of those cruisers.
3. The loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag.
4. The enhanced payments of insurance.
5. The prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion.

So far as these various losses and expenditures grew out of the acts committed by the several cruisers, the United States are entitled to ask compensation and remuneration therefor before this tribunal.

The claims for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes may be further subdivided into: 1. Claims for destruction of vessels and property of the Government of the United States; 2. Claims for the destruction of vessels and property under the flag of the United States; 3. Claims for damages or injuries to persons, growing out of the destruction of each class of vessels. In the accompanying volume VII the tribunal will find ample data for determining the amount of damage which should be awarded in consequence of the injuries inflicted by reason of the destruction of vessels or property, whether of the Government or of private persons.

* * * * * * *

The United States, with this reservation, present a detailed statement of all the claims which have as yet come to their knowledge, for the destruction of vessels and property by the cruisers. The statement shows the cruiser which did the injury, the vessel destroyed, the several claimants for the vessel and for the cargo, the amounts insured upon each, and all the other facts necessary to enable the tribunal to reach a conclusion as to the amount of the injury committed by the cruiser. It also shows the nature and character of the proof placed in the hands of the United States by the sufferers. The originals of the documents referred to are on file in the Department of State at Washington, and can be produced if desired.

* * * * * * *

On all these points evidence is presented which will enable the tribunal to ascertain and determine the amount of the several losses and injuries complained of. To the amount thus shown should be added interest upon the claims to the day when the award is payable by the terms of the treaty, namely, twelve months after the date of the award. The usual legal rate of interest in the city of New York, where most of the claims of individuals are held, is 7 per cent. per annum.

* * * * * * *

They earnestly hope that the tribunal will exercise the power conferred upon it to award a sum, in gross, to be paid by Great Britain to the United States. The injuries of which the United States complain were committed many years since. The original wrongs to the sufferers by the acts of the insurgent cruisers have been increased by the delay in making reparation. It will be unjust to impose further delay, and the expense of presenting claims to another tribunal, if the evidence which the United States have the honor to present for the consideration of these arbitrators shall prove to be sufficient to enable them to determine what sum, in gross, would be a just compensation to the United States for the injuries and losses of which they complain. (Case of the United States, part 6.)

These claims were, one and all of them, rejected as we have already shown, except the first one, for direct losses arising from the destruction of the vessels and their cargoes. The judgment is in these words, expressed in the language of Mr. Staempfli:

In the acts which have just been enumerated there exists a violation on the part of Great Britain of the obligations of neutrality laid down by the three rules; consequently Great Britain is responsible for the American ships which were destroyed by the vessel in question.

Protocol 27 shows that after the tribunal had rejected claims for cost of pursuing the cruisers as being comprised in the costs of the war, claims for prospective profits, and allowed only net freight, it then decided to consider at the next conference the valuation of the destroyed property and the claims for interest.

The proceedings show that the award was for such valuation and interest. True it does not distinctly appear what precise amount was allowed for each vessel, but when it is considered that the claims of the underwriters are for the specific amounts fixed by the contract of insurance, and that they were never greater than the actual value of the insured property, all the elements of certainty are found to exist which are necessary to do complete justice. Suppose an American merchant-vessel laden with cargo owned by several different owners should be destroyed at sea by wrong or carelessness of a colliding vessel. Her master sues as he may do before a foreign court in his own name for damages, and a gross sum is awarded him for the value of vessel and cargo. Could he withhold the fund from the true owners, because the judgment failed to specify the items allowed for each owner? What would be thought of a claim by him that he did not hold the money as trustee because the judgment was silent on that subject?

The claims were treated throughout as claims to indemnify the sufferers. In the statement made to the tribunal by the agent of the United States, Hon. J. Bancroft Davis, he says:

The object of the treaty is to indemnify the United States for all the losses suffered by their own citizens, and not to impose a part of that indemnification upon the United States themselves. (Volume 4, page 43 of the papers relating to the treaty of Washington.)

In his report to the State Department of September 21, 1872, Mr. Davis says:

We therefore devoted our energies toward securing such a sum as should be practically an indemnity to the sufferers. Whether we have or have not been successful can be determined only by the final division of the same.

Again, when Mr. Davis presented to the tribunal the list of American claims, with the insurance claims included, and the verifications thereof submitted by the companies, he concludes as follows:

It thus appears that these computations show the entire extent of all private losses which the results of the adjudication of this tribunal ought to enable the United States to make compensation for.

In the American Law Review for October, 1873, will be found a vigorous and able article maintaining the rights of insurance companies; and at page 19 will be found an interesting letter on this subject from one of the American counsel at Geneva, the learned Caleb Cushing, formerly Attorney-General of the United States, dated October 17, 1872, in which he says:

In the case of the "Alabama claims," however, the United States will have in their hands a definite sum of money, awarded against England by the tribunal of arbitration, and paid over by England to the United States for distribution among the parties interested, according to the award of the tribunal.

2. In the matter of the "Alabama claims," the agent and counsel of the United States presented to the tribunal detailed schedules and estimates of the claims of American citizens on account of captures by confederate cruisers fitted out in or dispatched from ports of Great Britain in violation of public law, sending forth the names of vessels captured and the names of parties interested, whether owners of ship, freight, or cargo, or officers and seamen, or insurers, and asserting the responsibility of Great Britain in the premises.

The tribunal, in the first place, adjudged Great Britain to be guilty in respect of all captures made by the Alabama and the Florida and their tenders, and by the Shenandoah after her departure from Melbourne.

The tribunal, in the second place, examined and scrutinized the schedules and estimates of individual losses presented by the United States, and on the inspection thereof awarded a sum in gross which they conceived to be sufficient (and which I think is sufficient) to afford a just indemnity to the injured citizens of the United States.

This gross sum will within the year be paid by Great Britain to the United States, with interest on any delay; it will be received and held by the United States as a trust fund to be distributed among the parties interested, conformably to the tenor and spirit of the award of the tribunal; and the Government will be bound to make such distribution promptly and justly, by the moral force of its duty of good faith to England, and its obligation to fulfill the stipulation of the treaty of Washington.

There is no contingency, uncertainty, or doubt in all this; you and the other parties in interest may, I do not hesitate to say, rest assured of the honor and good faith of the Government of the United States in this respect, with just as much of certitude as in the payment of the gold bonds of the Government.

That accomplished lawyer and jurist, William M. Evarts, was another of our counsel at Geneva, and formerly Attorney-General of the United States, and he has argued before the Judiciary Committee with great ability the rights of the insurance companies. May the action of Congress in distributing this award be so just that there shall be no occasion for the wronged insurance companies to invoke the official opinion of the third counsel of the United States, the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court?

Again I ask the question, and I hope each gentleman in the House will seek for a satisfactory answer to it, why are the insurance companies outlawed by this bill, provided they have made profits by their business during the war?

Is not the business of marine insurance a lawful business? If insurers make profits during war which enable them to support their families, or even to add to their property, do they thereby lose all claim to the protection of their Government? This bill treats them as outlaws.

If it had not been for these insurance companies, what would have become of our commerce during the war? Rather than incur the risks of the war our merchants and ship-owners would have suffered their vessels to remain rotting at the wharves, and our commerce would have perished. The business of insurers was not only legitimate and lawful, but it was in the highest degree beneficial to our people and our Government.

And yet this bill brands these insurers and their business as proper subjects for legislative condemnation. By what law, under what precedent, for what reason, on what principle does this Government make their right to participate in this award depend upon their success in business? Why should there be one law for the fortunate and another for the unfortunate underwriter? If a bill should be introduced proposing to pry into their business transacted during the war, and to confiscate for the benefit of the Treasury all the profits they had made, no one would doubt that the bill would be an odious attempt to confiscate the property of private citizens. But this bill differs from such a measure, not in principle but only in form.

We have seen that by the law as it has been declared for three-fourths of a century, both in England and America, the right of being substituted in place of the owner with all his rights and claims to the property insured and to any compensation for its destruction belongs to the insurer on payment of loss. This bill, however, declares that he shall have no such right if he was so diligent and prosperous that he made money.

Nay more. The Supreme Court has decided, as we have seen, that the payment of such loss operates like the most carefully framed assignment. It has been, however, the practice of many companies to take an actual assignment as a formal authentication of the insurer's title, this being a mere matter of convenience in dealing with a stranger, inasmuch as it relieves the insurer from the necessity of proving the different acts constituting his title, namely, the contract, the loss, and payment of the loss.

This bill, however, not only closes every possible avenue whereby the insurer can receive compensation unless he can prove the balance of his business account against him, but proceeds to declare every such assignment null and void unless it was founded upon some other consideration than the contract of insurance and payment of the loss. True, he has paid the full value of the interest assigned; true, his contract was lawful when made; true, it is entirely satisfactory to the parties to the assignment, and was not contrary to public policy; yet this bill condemns it. This bill first kills every claim of the insurer, and then proceeds to inflict punishment after death!

On the hearing at Geneva, it would have been a good answer to our claim for damages sustained by the insurance companies that these companies had derived sufficient benefits from the war to counterbalance their demands, provided the scheme of this bill is correct. The eminent lawyers of England presented the argument, but they had not the courage to claim that any further effect should be given to it than to meet the demand for interest, which depended upon discretion, but even to this extent it was scouted by the counsel for the United States and rejected by the arbitrators.

The argument of the British lawyers is thus stated:

With respect to the insurance companies, it must be remembered that, as against the losses which they paid, they received the benefit of the enormous war premiums which ruled at that time; and that these were the risks against which they indemnified themselves (and, it cannot be doubted, so as to make their business profitable upon the whole) by those extraordinary premiums. Would it be equitable now to reimburse them, not only the amount of all these losses, but interest thereon, without taking into account any part of the profits which they so received?

The answer to this argument by the American counsel was thus given:

(b.) We may also lay aside the suggestions prejudicial to the allowance of interest on the claims which by subrogation or assignment have been presented by the insurers who have indemnified the original sufferers. So far as Great Britain and this tribunal are concerned, who the private sufferers, and who represent them, and whether they were insured or not, and have been paid their insurance, are questions of no importance. But it is worth while to look this argument in the face for a moment. Some of the sufferers by the depredations of the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah, were insured by American underwriters. These sufferers have collected their indemnity from the underwriters, and have assigned to them their claims.

The enhanced premiums of insurance on general American commerce have, presumptively, enriched the insurance companies. Great Britain should have the benefits of these profits, and the underwriters, at least, should lose interest on their claims. It is difficult to say whether the private or the public considerations which enter into this syllogism are most illogical. Certainly we did not expect that "the enhanced payments of insurance," which Great Britain could not tolerate, and the tribunal has excluded as too indirect consequences of the acts of the cruisers to be entertained when presented by the merchants who had paid them, were to be brought into play by Great Britain itself as direct enough in the general business of underwriting, to reduce the indemnity on insured losses, which, if uninsured, they would have been entitled to.

If the Geneva award really belongs to the United States as absolute owner, then I enter my protest against the disposition made of it by this bill. We have no moral right to give it away to the claimants for war premiums, or to dole out any portion of it to the insurance companies who lost money during the war. It is better a thousand times to bestow it upon the widows and orphans of the noble Union soldiers who fell in the war for the Union. Better distribute it in pensions among the crippled and sleeveless soldiers and sailors who were wounded in that war. Better expend it in the erection of retreats and asylums for the poor, the unfortunate, and the worthy objects of charity among us. Better even leave it in the Treasury, to be applied hereafter as may be required by the public welfare.

I have heard it suggested as an argument tending to show that the claims of the insurance companies were not included in the award, that the arbitrators rejected double claims; but a very slight examination of the documents will show that this argument has no substantial foundation.

It happened that in receiving and presenting claims our Government blended together claims to a limited extent in favor both of the owners and insurers for loss of the same vessel. This arose from the fact that in some cases the insurance was only for part of the value of the vessel and cargo, and hence claims existed in favor both of the owner and insurer, and also from the fact that our Government had nothing to do with liquidating or auditing these claims. It appeared that claims of this character were presented as to seven whaling-ships destroyed by the Shenandoah, and as to partial claims upon twenty-three other vessels. The aggregate amount of these duplicated claims was about one million and a half of dollars, and the English counsel deducted that amount from the sum embraced in the list made up by the American counsel. (See volume 3 of the papers relating to the Washington treaty, page 610, et seq.) No intention existed on the part of our agents to demand this double compensation, as was fully explained, and the arbitrators simply decided that these duplicated claims could not be allowed. But this does not in the least degree prove or tend to prove that the single value of the property destroyed was not allowed, while the proofs, as already stated, show that such allowance was actually made. I give extracts from the proceedings at Geneva showing precisely how this question of double claims was treated:

In the second place, wherever the owner puts forward a claim for his loss, at the same time that the insurance company also claim the money paid by them in respect of the same loss, such a double claim must at once be rejected, since to allow it would be in effect to sanction the payment of the loss twice over. (Counter case of Great Britain, volume 2, page 385.)

We readily admit that, whenever the owner puts forward a claim for his loss at the same time that the insurance company also claims for the money paid by them in respect of the same loss, then only one value of the property destroyed can be allowed; but we insist that in all such cases the award should be equal to the full value of the property destroyed. (Argument of the United States, volume 3, page 252, Note D.)

In the second place, a closer examination of the claims made for cargo in the former statement when compared with those in the original list and in the revised statement has enabled us to discover the following cases of double claims for single losses, in addition to those commented on at page 27 of our first report:

* * * * * * * *

2. The Charter Oak. (page 182 of former, and page 231 of Revised Statement, Shenandoah, class C.) Here the Manufacturers' Insurance Company claim $3,500 as insurers on cargo, and the Columbian Insurance Company likewise claim the same amount as reinsurers for the former company. This is therefore a double claim, and $3,500 must also be deducted from the allowances made on our first report. (British Argument, volume 3, page 336, Annex C, Report of the Board of Trade.)

(C.) As to the double claims:

They consist in the main of claims made by the owners for the value of their property, simultaneously with claims advanced by insurance companies with whom the property was insured, and who paid the owners the amount of their loss. To pay the owners and the insurance companies these double claims would be clearly equivalent to paying the losses twice over. One of these claims, therefore, must necessarily be rejected. (Opinions of Sir Alexander Cockburn, volume 4, page 539.)

* * * * * * * *

The tribunal proceeded to the consideration of the matters submitted to them, and unanimously declared that the "double claims" should be dismissed. (Protocol 27, volume 4, page 44.)

It has also been said that the instructions of Secretary Fish to our agent, Mr. Davis, that he should not commit the Government to the payment either to the owners or insurers, as that question should be reserved for the future action of the Government, tends to prove that the award was the property of the Government. But that instruction only related to the question of double claims which had been raised, and simply purported that as between the two classes of claimants the question should be kept open. The agent did not violate such instructions; nor did he misunderstand them when he informed the tribunal that the United States claimed compensation for the losses of her citizens for the purpose of indemnifying them against such losses as they had suffered. No private instructions by our Government to its agents could change or affect in any manner the character of the award, and that as already shown was demanded, awarded, paid, and received under such facts and circumstances as to constitute a trust on the part of our Government. That trust is so clearly stamped upon the fund, that no sophistry can obscure it, no ability change it, and no act discharge it, except a release from the true owners or payment to them.

It has been argued that the insurers have no claim upon this fund, because there could be no spes recuperandi against the rebels; therefore there could be none against Great Britain, who was only an accessory of the rebels. This argument is altogether too refined for practical use. The doctrine of principal and accessory, as known in criminal law, has no application to the conduct of nations. Great Britain was either an enemy or a neutral. The spes recuperandi embraces all indemnity received, whether anticipated by the parties or not. It was an incident of the contract that whenever, wherever, or from whatever source received, it belonged to the insurers who paid the loss. The Amerique was recently abandoned by her passengers and crew under such circumstances that it was believed she must inevitably sink within two hours, and if the underwriters had been called on for payment, they would have paid without the slightest expectation that she would ever be recovered. She was in fact found some days afterward floating in a trough of the sea and saved with all her cargo. She was none the less the property of the underwriters although her recovery was unexpected.

Our Government treated Great Britain as a neutral. She was in no proper sense a belligerent, for no war existed between her and our country. The relation in which both countries regarded her was that of a neutral. The treaty of Washington proceeds throughout upon the theory that she was a neutral, and the question of her liability was submitted upon the issue whether she had failed to comply with her duties and obligations as a neutral nation. Our Government presented the claims of our citizens against her solely on that ground, and on that ground the judgment was pronounced against her, and such claims were allowed. What can be more unjust now, than for our Government to change its position in dealing with the award, and declare to its own citizens that Great Britain was an ally of the confederates, and therefore was not liable for the damages recovered, and hence they are entitled to no indemnity for their losses? It is equivalent to saying we have obtained this money from Great Britain by fraud and false pretenses.

This question is totally unimportant, because even if Great Britain was a belligerent, and as such had destroyed insured property, and yet at the close of the war had made a treaty under which indemnity had been made to our Government for such property destroyed, the right of subrogation would in such a case have given to the underwriters the right to receive and hold the moneys for property lost which had been paid for by the insurers to the owners.

Our minister to England notified the British government at the very commencement that our Government would hold it responsible for the acts of these cruisers which were suffered to go forth from British ports to prey upon our commerce. Every intelligent underwriter, like every intelligent loyal citizen, believed that the question of satisfaction for the destruction of our commerce was only a question of time. He believed that such atonement would be made by treaty either with or without war, and that such payment would be procured by voluntary action on the part of England, or by the seizure of the British North American provinces that lay so temptingly near to our northern borders, or by the issue of letters of marque and reprisal to take the valuable ships of England found floating upon every sea.

It is with a distrust arising from the acquiescence of so many able and patriotic lawyers who seem to have favored the spoliation of insurance companies allowed by this bill that I call the attention of the House to the proposition that this bill is repugnant to the Constitution because it deprives the underwriters of their property without due process of law, or takes private property for public use without just compensation. (Fifth amendment to Constitution.)

Every lawyer knows that the words "due process of law" do not mean a mere law of Congress, but that it involves a proceeding in a court of justice, acting according to the settled usages and modes of proceeding existing in the common law of England before the emigration of our ancestors. (Vide 18 Howard, 276, Murray's lessee; also, Taylor vs. Porter, 4 Hill, 146.) The only questions then left are whether this bill deprives the insurers of property.

What is property? Mr. Webster said in the speech from which I have quoted:

> A claim or demand for a ship unjustly seized and confiscated is property as clearly as the ship itself. It may not be so valuable or so certain, but it is as clear a right and has been uniformly so regarded by the courts of law. (Webster's Works, volume 4, page 153.)

In the present case the claim has progressed so far that the wrong-doer has actually paid the money over to the United States, and it now remains in its Treasury. Judge Cooley says in his excellent work on Constitutional Limitations:

> A vested right of action is property, in the same sense in which tangible things are property, and is equally protected against arbitrary interference. Nor can a party by his misconduct so forfeit a right that it may be taken from him without judicial proceedings in which the forfeiture shall be declared in due form. Forfeitures of rights and property cannot be adjudged by legislative act, and confiscations without a judicial hearing, after due notice, would be void, as not being due process of law.

The inequality and injustice of this bill strikingly appear when we observe its effect upon members of mutual insurance companies, if as is proposed in certain quarters and in the Senate bill as it originally came to this House, mutual companies shall also be required to show how their account of business during the war stands. A mutual insurance company is an association of persons who insure the property of their own members only, and of course they make no profits for distribution as in the case of stock companies.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TREMAIN. A question; yes.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman says that these mutual insurance companies cannot make a profit. Will he state how it is that the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company of New York has obtained a capital of $9,000,000?

Mr. TREMAIN. I have the returns showing that in these mutual insurance companies that which is called their capital consists of their premium notes, that their dividend is simply their scrip notes that are returned. I have papers signed by every president of a mutual insurance company of New York, constituting the principal bulk of these claimants, showing that there is a common fund created of war premiums and ordinary premiums; but when a loss occurs it is paid out of that common fund. It shows that by their charters as mutual insurance companies, they are simply allowed to form a company by which each one contributes a certain amount for the insurance of his vessel; and at the end of the year the surplus is divided either by returning the cash or the scrip to the amount which they have on hand. It is just as impossible that they can make any profit as it is that two men can each get rich by swapping jackets from morning till night.

Mr. FRYE. I asked the gentleman how it was that that company had obtained a capital of $9,000,000 invested in United States and State stocks.

Mr. TREMAIN. I know nothing about the case to which the gentleman refers. There was no such case presented to the committee.

Mr. FRYE. Allow me to ask one other question right here. The gentleman talks about the formation of mutual insurance companies. I ask him if there is not a statute of New York which provides that these mutual insurance companies shall become stock companies to a certain extent; and if one-half of them are not hybrid, stock and mutual insurance companies combined?

Mr. TREMAIN. I cannot say. I only say that the mutual insurance companies included in this bill are not stock companies to any extent; simply mutual insurance companies. And I should be willing to have the fate of this bill depend upon the solution of that question of fact. This whole question was considered in committee, and you could not have got your bill reported except by putting in an allowance for mutual insurance companies. And yet the first thing when this bill comes up to-day you allow an amendment to strike out the mutual insurance companies and put them on a par with stock insurance companies.

Mr. FRYE. We were deliberately cheated into it by the misrepresentations of the insurance men.

Mr. TREMAIN. There were no insurance company men that appeared before the committee to my knowledge, except the most eminent members of the New York bar, such as Mr. Evarts and others.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. J. L. Ward, of Washington, put his argument on file.

Mr. TREMAIN. Several of the most eminent members of the New York bar appeared. I hurl back upon these champions of the war-premium claims the idea that the committee was cheated into including this provision in this bill as being totally unfounded in fact. And I charge that except for the support of Mr. WARD, of Illinois—which he never would have given unless you had put in these mutual insurance companies—you never would have been able to report your bill to the House. And yet your first act is to come in here and strike down the insurance companies by providing that they cannot recover a dollar unless they show what everybody knows they cannot show, that upon a strict account of profit and loss they did not get premiums enough to cover their losses.

In the case of mutual insurance companies the average number of their members who during the war paid premiums and were insured for war risks was about one-fourth or one-fifth of the whole number, while the remaining members only paid premiums for and were insured against the ordinary marine risks. Under a bill allowing war premiums and excluding insurance companies whose premiums equaled their losses, those members who paid premiums for war risks would come in and receive from the award the amount of such premiums. These members have been paid their loss out of the funds of the company, but neither the company as such nor the members of the company will receive any part of the money paid out by them to those who had been insured against the risks. The effect of the bill is that no indemnity whatever is paid to any person for the value of the vessels and cargoes destroyed, although the claims for such vessels and cargoes were presented by our Government and were actually included in the award. Another effect is that a small portion of the members receive what they paid for premiums while the great mass of members receive nothing for what they paid to the members whose property was destroyed, nor for the amount of their own premiums or business expenses. I present herewith an illustration of the modus operandi of mutual insurance companies, and also of what would be the operation of this bill, if the mutual companies were placed upon the same footing as stock companies, prepared by a competent expert:

> A mutual marine insurance company is a mere association of individuals for the purpose of dividing their marine losses. It has no stockholders and no stock; it declares no dividends, accumulates no surplus, and has no interests adverse to or separate from those of its policy-holders. The underlying principle of mutual marine insurance is copartnership in or division of loss. Each policy-taker during the year agrees with the others to bear, to the extent of the premium paid by him, his proportionate share of such losses as all may suffer. Policy-holders pay premiums: 1. To fix the limit of their liability; 2. To provide a fund for the prompt payment of losses. At the end of the year so much of the aggregated premiums as is unconsumed by the losses of that year is returned to the policy-holder pro rata.
> The effect of the proposed exclusion of these insurance companies from participation in the "Geneva award," unless they can show an excess of "war losses" paid over "war premiums" received, is grave injustice to large numbers of insured, and an actual sequestration of their property.
> A simple illustration shows this. Take the case of a mutual marine insurance company which in 1864 may be supposed to have consisted of one thousand members or policy-holders; of these—
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Two hundred had insured the same amount each against the perils of war, at a premium of 10 per cent., and paid into the common fund each $1,000 | 200,000 |
> | The company then had a fund, out of which to pay the losses of the year, of | 1,000,000 |
> | During the year losses occurred to the property covered by nineteen of the war policies, which were thereupon paid out of the common fund | 190,000 |
> | There was then left of this fund to be repaid to the policy-holders | 810,000 |
> or 81 per cent. of the premium paid by each, each insurer contributing 19 per cent. of his premium to pay these losses; the eight hundred not insured against war risks actually paying four-fifths of the war losses.
> This company, acting merely as the agent for these policy-holders, now asks to be repaid these losses out of the "award," that it may repay to them the balance of their premiums which but for these losses they would have received. But its books show that it received $200,000 of "war premiums," and paid only $190,000 of war losses, and it is therefore proposed to deny its application.
> The two hundred partners who insured against war risks are, however, to be allowed to recover the 19 per cent. of the premiums paid by them, and eaten up by the war losses, amounting to $38,000.
> The practical result is to sequester $152,000, belonging to the eight hundred merchants who insured only against the ordinary perils of the sea.

What becomes of that $152,000? It forms part of the award, but not being paid out to the insurance companies, it would of course remain in the Treasury; but the bill steps in and declares it shall be paid out to other parties whose claims were not allowed and formed no part of the fund. This bill deprives the underwriter of his property unless he can show that his general business resulted in a loss, and as it did not result in a loss, he is not only unable to recover his own property, but the bill provides that it shall be paid away to other persons.

It is no answer to this argument to say that the insurer or owner had no right to recover against Great Britain in any court of law, because she could not be sued. She has waived her sovereign right of exemption from suit. She has consented to appear in court and to submit to its jurisdiction. Nay, more; she has paid and satisfied the judgment recovered against her. I am just as effectually deprived of my property when I am prohibited from enjoying it unless I shall comply with some impossible condition, as if it were taken from me by an armed soldiery.

The objections which I have urged to the bill on account of its provisions in regard to insurance companies do not apply as to mutual insurance companies, for as to them it very properly allows them to recover for their actual losses. As to them, however, it places them in the second class, whereas they ought, as it appears to me, to be put in the first class, because their losses are direct losses—as much so as any other losses which are embraced in the first class.

The stock insurance companies are excluded, as I have before stated, upon the theory that they made large profits during the war; and upon this supposition they are excluded under this bill unless their account shall show that their losses exceeded their premiums, which it is not likely can be shown in relation to any of them, because it is scarcely probable that their premiums were not sufficient to pay their losses, and that they still carried on business, paying its expenses as an entire loss.

If during the war these companies did make profits it was their good fortune and they ought to be permitted to enjoy it. The proverbially hazardous and unprofitable nature of the business of marine insurance is thus described in the article from the Law Review:

The underwriter may or may not be rich. He may be rich to-day and poor to-morrow. An eminent merchant remarked not long since that if he were a trustee he would as soon invest property of his ward in a corner grocery as in the stock of an insurance company. The field of commercial history is strewn with the wrecks of such companies. As they seldom or never dissolve while prosperous, it may be said that their form of natural death is bankruptcy.

After the ratification of the treaty of Washington a circular was issued under the direction of the Secretary of State, informing claimants "that all claims growing out of the acts of the cruisers would be presented to the tribunal, leaving that body to determine on their merits." (Report of Mr. Davis, vide Papers relating to the treaty, volume 4, page 2.)

Two points were plainly implied in this circular; first, that the Government assumed no liability in receiving and presenting such claims, for they were to be determined by the Geneva tribunal; and second, that if they were allowed by such tribunal they should be paid out of the award. This bill reverses the effect of the circular by making our Government responsible for all claims it received and presented, although the tribunal decided against them on the merits, and it rejects claims in favor of insurers which were presented and allowed. When we consider that as to all such claims both the treaty and the award declared that they were "fully, perfectly, and finally settled," we cannot fail to discover the great injustice perpetrated by this bill upon the insurers.

It is true the bill as reported does partial justice to the underwriters by allowing the claims of mutual insurance companies, but I regard the other insurers as equally entitled to consideration. In my judgment their claims rest upon the plainest principles of justice and right, and I can vote for no bill which deprives them of their right to share in the award and transfers their money to other parties to whom it does not belong.

I would cheerfully support Judge POLAND'S bill which provides for one suit in the nature of a bill of interpleader to be filed by the United States against all the claimants, and provides that the fund shall be distributed according to the principles of law and equity, the decree of the court being subject to an appeal to the Supreme Court, for I feel confident no court that had the right to decide upon the merits could exclude the insurers. I greatly prefer to the present bill the one which I had the honor to introduce, which distributes the fund among the parties whose losses are allowed and constitute the award, leaving the balance, if any, in the Treasury.

And now, Mr. Speaker, having entered my protest against these features of this bill which are repugnant to my sense of justice, I shall cheerfully submit the decision of the questions involved to the better judgment of the House. Although some of these companies are located in the city of New York, I have no acquaintance with any officer or member thereof to my knowledge, and have no desire in relation to the matter except that this award shall be distributed in conformity with the eternal principles of natural justice.

The Government cannot afford to do deliberate wrong to any one, even the humblest of its citizens. Let us distribute this award in such a manner that no part of our own people shall have any cause to complain that their rights have been violated, and no stain shall rest upon the national honor and good faith in the judgment of the civilized world.

EXHIBIT A.

SUMS INCLUDED IN THE GENEVA AWARD.

In making the award the arbitrators confined their decision to the damage done by the Alabama, (and her tender the Tuscaloosa,) the Florida, (and her tenders, the Clarence, the Tacony, and the Archer,) and the Shenandoah, after her departure from Melbourne; rejecting generally all other claims, and (besides the so-called indirect claims first rejected) particularly specifying as rejected. 1. The cost of pursuit; 2. Prospective earnings; all double claims for the same losses, and all claims for gross freights, so far as they exceed net freights.

They agreed to allow interest at a reasonable rate, and deemed it "preferable to adopt the form of adjudication of a sum in gross, rather than to refer the subject of compensation for further discussion and deliberation to a board of assessors, as provided by article 10 of the said treaty." A detailed statement was then presented by the agent of the United States specifying the particular vessels destroyed which came within the decision, and the amounts claimed for each and for its different parts.

In the following table the "American claim" is taken from the statement presented to the arbitrators by the agent of the United States, Mr. Bancroft Davis, August 19, 1872. (See Papers relating to the Treaty of Washington, volume 3, page 579, &c.)

The "British allowance" is taken from the table presented by the British agent at the same time—(Ibid., page 610, &c.)

The "Arbitrators' allowance" is estimated. The rule followed, being deduced in the main from the twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth protocols, is as follows: Double claims, claims for prospective profits, and the hypothetical claims first submitted on the 19th August, 1872, are omitted. And with those deductions the American valuation for vessel and outfit is assumed as correct. Twenty-five per cent. on the value of the vessels is added in the case of whalers in lieu of prospective profits as or including wages, and in the case of merchant vessels as net freights and wages combined.

The result, approximating so closely the actual allowance, taking into consideration the insufficient data accessible, demonstrates the correctness of the rule as the one adopted by the arbitrators.

Mr. POLAND obtained the floor and said: I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOODFORD.]

Mr. WOODFORD. Fifteen and one-half million dollars have been received into the Treasury of the United States, paid by Great Britain in pursuance of the decree of the highest court whereof history makes mention. This decree was entered in a suit to which nations were parties, in which nations were the judges, and of which the whole world were attentive observers. The disposition to be made of this large sum of money and the manner of that disposition, are the questions for our present decision. Let us hope that the future will set the stamp of its approval upon this the last step in this unprecedented litigation. To one point only of the many which arise do I desire to call the attention of the House, but that point seems to me the controlling one of all.

Two theories obtain touching the relationship of the Government to this fund. The one is that this money is the absolute property of the United States, that is of the whole nation, to be disposed of like other moneys in the Treasury, according to the pleasure of Congress. The other, that the Government holds this money in trust only for the benefit of those who are justly entitled to it.

To the reader of the debates in both Houses of Congress last year, in the Senate this year, and of the reports of the Judiciary Committee, it is manifest that the existence of these two theories is at the bottom of all the controversy which has arisen.

It may fairly be presumed that the leading supporters of the Senate bill, which, as amended, is now under consideration, placed in its strongest light before the Senate the argument in favor of the theory of an absolute national ownership of this fund, for upon that theory the bill as well as the substitute proposed by the majority of the House committee are based.

Let me quote their words. I read from the RECORD of May 13:

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. * * * The claim of the United States against Great Britain was national. It was not for individual injury. Robust debaters can go to great lengths in putting forward propositions, but I do not think any one with this treaty before him can deny that the claim made by the United States was in its character national. The treaty says: "The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty being desirous to provide for an amicable settlement of all causes of difference between the countries." Again it says: "Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty;" and again: "Now in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States." These expressions clearly prove the claim to have been that of the nation. * * * * *

But from the very nature of the claim of the ship-owner who lost his vessel, it cannot be individual or personal in its character. His loss was by an act of war. He had no claim against the confederacy, and still more remote would be any claim against Great Britain, the allies, or the abettors of the confederacy. If General Lee at Gettysburgh had burned down one's barn, the owner surely had no claim against the confederacy; and if Lee's army had been supplied with provisions by Canada, still less would he have had any claim against Canada. Therefore from the very nature of the claim, as well as from the repeated declarations of the treaty, the claim made by the United States was national.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But let us go a little further. I have only spoken now of the state of the case which is presented to us here, that this property was admittedly destroyed as a belligerent act by vessels of the Confederate States of America, and that Great Britain was held responsible in respect to these vessels, and in respect to this particular destruction, she, in the language of the publicists, was the ally or the associate or the assistant causing that destruction, which possibly the direct and immediate belligerent would not have been able to do, if she had not received this friendly assistance from the nation which in that respect was her ally and associate. * * * * *

Where, then, does the citizen of the United States stand in this case? He stands as a man who is the citizen of a country engaged in a public warfare; he stands as a man whose ship in that public warfare has been sunk by the cannon of the enemy; and then when we look to the reclamation we find that that public enemy was assisted in their destruction by a nation which, according to the definition of the publicists and according to the decision of this tribunal, was not in respect to these vessels a neutral nation, but that in violation of the attitude of neutrality that she pretended to occupy, she had become an ally and an assistant of the confederate forces who were making war upon us and was therefore responsible to us as a nation for the consequences of the destruction that she aided the public enemies of the United States to commit; and in that case, as I have shown from the decisions of our own courts and from the principles that the publicists have always laid down, the citizen of the United States has no individual claim against anybody.

In these two brief extracts we have the whole of the argument upon which the mistaken theory of a national ownership of this fund is based. Stripped of its verbiage we may paraphrase it thus:

The destruction of the vessels and property for which this money was awarded was the lawful act of a belligerent engaged in public war; Great Britain was the ally of the principal belligerent; for the lawful destruction of his property by one belligerent the citizen of the other belligerent has no claim for damages upon the hostile government, still less upon its ally; therefore no citizen of the United States had any claim upon the government of Great Britain for the loss of his property destroyed by the Alabama, and by consequence no citizen of the United States has any claim upon this fund, which, ex necessitate rei, is public property.

There, sir, is the argument and the conclusion. By that argument must the theory of national ownership of this fund stand or fall. If the argument be inadmissible, then this money is held as a trust for the benefit of those equitably entitled to it, and I do not dare to believe that any gentleman upon this floor would wish or vote to deprive the least of those of his just right.

Let us see, sir, whether our Government has hitherto taken the ground that the owners of this destroyed property had no claim against England for its value. Let us follow the action of this Government from the time when the first confederate cruiser sailed from a British port on her mission of destruction, and see whether we are at liberty to adopt this theory of a national ownership of this fifteen and one-half millions of dollars, without stultifying ourselves, and turning what is justly regarded as the most brilliant chapter of our diplomatic history into a pitiful record of public pettifogging, to the everlasting humiliation and shame of the nation.

In answer to resolutions of December 4 and 10, 1867, and May 27, 1868, the Secretary of State transmitted to the Senate a mass of correspondence concerning claims against Great Britain, which was published in 1870 in five volumes, and was subsequently presented to the tribunal at Geneva as a part of the appendix to the American case, and as constituting the bulk of the evidence on which the United States relied. In volume 3 of this correspondence, or, to use the title of the books, of the "Claims of United States against Great Britain," at page 56 is found the following dispatch:

Mr. Seward to Mr. Adams.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 25, 1862

SIR: I send herewith copies of papers which have just been received from James E. Harvey, esq., our minister at Lisbon, touching the depredations of piratical vessels built, armed, manned, and equipped in British ports, and dispatched from such ports upon the American merchant-vessels on the high seas near the Island of Flores.

The President desires that you lay copies or the substance of them before Earl Russell, in such manner as shall seem best calculated to effect two important objects: First, due redress for the national and private injuries sustained; and, secondly, a prevention of such lawless and injurious proceedings hereafter.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, Esq., &c.

The inclosures related to the destruction of the Ocmulgee, Ocean Rover, Alert, Weather Gauge, Starlight, Altamaha, Admiral Blake, Benjamin Tucker, Osceola, and Courser by the Alabama.

As directed in this dispatch, Mr. Adams, on the 20th November, 1862, addressed a communication to Earl Russell, to be found at page 70 of the same volume, in which occur these passages:

The question will then remain how far the failure of the proceedings, thus admitted to have been instituted by Her Majesty's government to prevent the departure of this vessel, affects the right of reclamation of the Government of the United States for the grievous damage done to the property of their citizens in permitting the escape of this lawless pirate from its jurisdiction.

And here it may not be without its use to call to your lordship's recollection for a moment the fact that this question, like almost all others connected with the duty of neutrals in time of war on the high seas, has been much agitated in the discussions heretofore held between the authorities of the two countries. During the latter part of the last century it fell to the lot of Her Majesty's government to make the strongest remonstrances against the fitting out in the ports of the United States of vessels with an intent to prey upon British commerce, not, however, in the barbarous and illegal manner shown to have been practiced by No. 290, but subject to the forms of ultimate adjudication equally recognized by all civilized nations. And they went the further length of urging the acknowledgment of the principle of compensation in damages for the consequences of not preventing the departure of such vessels. That principle was formally recognized as valid by both parties in the seventh article of the treaty of the 19th November, 1794, and accordingly all cases of damage previously done by capture of British vessels or merchandise by vessels originally fitted out in the ports of the United States were therein agreed to be referred to a commission provided for by that treaty to award the necessary sums for full compensation. * * * * * * * *

Armed by the authority of such a precedent, having done all in my power to apprise Her Majesty's government of the illegal enterprise in ample season for effecting its prevention, and being now enabled to show the injurious consequences to innocent parties relying upon the security of their commerce from any danger through British sources ensuing from the omission of Her Majesty's government, however little designed, to apply the proper prevention in due season, I have the honor to inform your lordship of the directions which I have received from my government to solicit redress for the national and private injuries thus sustained, as well as a more effective prevention of such lawless and injurious proceedings in Her Majesty's ports hereafter.

Earl Russell's reply to this communication, dated December 19, 1862, is to be found at page 88 of the same volume, and in it, after controverting the arguments of Mr. Adams, he says, page 92:

Her Majesty's government cannot therefore admit that they are under any obligation whatever to make compensation to United States citizens on account of the proceedings of that vessel.

Palpably Earl Russell understood that the claims of private citizens against his government were under discussion.

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Adams addressed a note to Earl Russell replying to his arguments, in which, at page 95, occurs the following passage:

If, by the preceding representation, I have succeeded in making myself clearly understood by your lordship, then will it, I flatter myself, be made to appear that in both these cases, that in 1794 as well as that in 1862, the claim made rests on one and the same basis, to wit, reparation by a neutral nation of a wrong done to another nation with which it is at peace, by reason of a neglect to prevent the cause of it originating among its own citizens in its own ports.

These three dispatches were forwarded by Mr. Adams to the State Department here, and on the 19th of January following, Mr. Seward wrote Mr. Adams approving his course in these words, page 113:

You have properly replied to Earl Russell's note, and cleared up the argument of the case by a paper which seems to the President as convincing as it is calm and truthful. Earl Russell's argument does not satisfy the President that redress ought not to be granted to our citizens for the depredations which have been committed by the 290. He trusts that your reply may yet induce a reconsideration of that subject.

Where is the intimation in this correspondence that "no citizen of the United States had or could have any claim against Great Britain by reason of the acts of this confederate cruiser No. 290," or the Alabama, as she was better known? Is not every word instinct with the affirmation of the converse of that proposition?

Can the following dispatch be reconciled with the doctrine of "no private claim?" (page 155:)

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 18, 1863.

SIR: I transmit with this dispatch a copy of a letter of the 4th instant, from Edward Mott Robinson, &c., * * * relative to their claim on the British government on account of the destruction of the ship Golden Eagle by the armed insurgent steamer Alabama. As one of the claims of citizens of the United States, growing out of the lawless depredations upon American commerce by insurgent vessels sent out from British ports, I have to request you to bring it under the consideration of Her Majesty's government in such manner as may seem to you most appropriate.

* * * * * * *

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, Esq.

Or this, at page 163:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 17, 1863.

SIR: I now add to the number of similar cases already intrusted to your charge that of the American bark Union Jack, destroyed by the piratical vessel, of British origin and equipment, commonly designated the Alabama, and will thank you to take such steps in the matter as shall, in your judgment, tend to secure such redress as may be justly due to the aggrieved parties from Her Britannic Majesty's government.

* * * * * * *

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, Esq.

Or this, page 176:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 5, 1863.

SIR: Referring to my No. 727, of the 30th ultimo, I now inclose a copy of a communication of the 1st instant, addressed to me by J. D. Jones, esq., president of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company of New York, relative to the claim of that company against the British government on account of losses growing out of the destruction of the American ship Brilliant, of that port.

* * * * * * *

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, Esq., &c.

Mr. Speaker, further multiplication of instances is unnecessary—the book is full of them. Claim after claim was presented in the same way, invariably as the claim of an individual. Our Government insisted that each claim was valid. Great Britain denied it; negotiation ensued; the "treaty of Washington" was made. Article 1 of this treaty reads:

Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty and still exist, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generally known as the Alabama claims;

* * * * * * *

Now, in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States, and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims, which are not admitted by Her Britannic Majesty's Government, the high contracting parties agree that all the said claims growing out of acts committed by the aforesaid vessels and generically known as the "Alabama claims" shall be referred to a tribunal of arbitration," &c.

Mr. Speaker, what differences had arisen between the two governments growing out of the acts of these cruisers, except a difference of opinion as to the validity of these claims, which, in all the correspondence from which I have presented specimen extracts, have been treated and styled the claims of individuals? What question was thus referred to arbitration except the validity of these claims? Can any gentleman answer? I think not.

One other branch of the argument and I have finished. It is urged that these marauding vessels were enemy's men-of-war, lawfully cruising, and therefore for their acts no American had lawful claim against any one. Hear what the American case, prepared by our agent under State Department supervision, and presented to the tribunal under governmental sanction, says:

It has been intimated, in the course of the discussion upon these questions between the two governments, that it may be said on the part of Great Britain that its power to interfere with, to arrest, or to detain either of the belligerent cruisers whose acts are complained of ceased when it was commissioned as a man-of-war; and that, consequently, its liability for their actions ceased.

The parallel is complete between these commissions and those issued by Genet in 1793, which were disregarded by the United States at the instance of Great Britain. If a piece of paper, emanating through an English office, from men who had no nationality recognized by Great Britain, and who had no open port into which a vessel could go unmolested, was potent not only to legalize the depredations of British built and manned cruisers upon the commerce of the United States, but also to release the responsibility of Great Britain, therefor then this arbitration is indeed a farce. Such, however, cannot be the case. * * *

The United States do not deny the force of the commission of a man-of-war issuing from a recognized power. * * * They do, however, most confidently deny that the receipt of a commission by a vessel like the Alabama, or the Florida, or the Georgia, or the Shenandoah exempted Great Britain from the liability growing out of the violation of her neutrality.—Message and Documents, Department of State, part 2. volume 1, 1872-'73, pages 84, 85.

Mr. Speaker, in view of this consistent record, bearing in mind the two circulars from the State Department, one calling upon all citizens to file their claims against foreign governments forthwith, and the other promising to present all claims filed against Great Britain to the tribunal of arbitration; and remembering that these claims so filed were presented with their accompanying proofs to this tribunal, which weighed them all and allowed a sum of money in satisfaction of such as they held valid, it seems to me that we are not now at liberty to say that we swindled Great Britain and deluded the tribunal into the allowance of a sum of money in satisfaction of a groundless claim for damages.

However captivating the sophistry, nay, further, even conceding the truth of the argument and the fact, the United States is estopped on the record to deny that this money was awarded in respect of a number of private claimants. Who they are and to what sums entitled, it seems to me, is no question for this body to decide. Investigations of this sort belong properly to the courts. Let us refer all claimants alike to some fitting tribunal to whose decision no exception can be taken, and in such reference let us not stultify ourselves, and insult the law-abiding spirit of the country by shutting the court-room door in the face of any. It is the proudest boast of our country that here before the law all are equal. The present is not the time nor is this the occasion to proclaim the opposite rule.

Can any honest claimant rightly hesitate to submit his claim to the decision of a court of the United States? I think not.

What would be thought of the title of a man who should ask the passage of a law forbidding any courts to entertain an action of ejectment against him? What Congress would hasten to pass the law? So in this case, if any there be who deem themselves entitled to any share of this money, let us not refuse them their day in court for fear their claim may be a just one.

He who asks us to take such a course asks us to do injustice and to legalize wrong.

If any one is entitled to this money let him have it. If no one is entitled to it let the Government keep it. But let the question of title be judicially determined.

Now let me ask any gentleman on the opposite side of this question to tell me what difference had arisen between Great Britain and the United States? What ground of quarrel was there? What reason for war? Why it was this, and this alone—that the property of private citizens of the United States, protected by our flag, had been seized upon the ocean by armed vessels which had been fitted out in Great Britain. We claimed that our citizens were entitled to redress. We claimed that Great Britain was bound to pay the bill and make good the damage thus inflicted. Great Britain denied our claim. To avert war, we solemnly entered into compact and created this great tribunal. Laying aside the old traditions of armies and of war, in the better spirit of this nineteenth century we met as Christian nations should meet, and far beyond the ocean, among the hills of that little republic of Switzerland, the flags of two mighty nations blended together in harmony. There, setting an example for all the civilized peoples of the world, the old mother country and her child met together and held this great tribunal of amity and of justice. But we are now called upon to pettifog and to quibble. Gentlemen come into this Hall and say that we should not be bound by the decree of that high court. They say that having recovered this money we should so expend it among our people as will most benefit the re-election of some half-dozen congressmen or be most pleasing to some half-dozen constituencies.

I shall not weary you with longer detail. If I have succeeded in any manner in demonstrating that this negotiation grew out of the presentation of the claims of private citizens through the agency of the Government, I have demonstrated that this is a trust fund. But there is something higher than the argument of logical deduction. There is fact—hard, stubborn fact. There is the contemporaneous action of the time when this award was paid over—the action of the Secretary of State who received it from the agents of the British government, and of the Secretary of the Treasury who received it from Mr. Fish. I suppose that most gentlemen are familiar with the appearance of the certificate of deposit, [exhibiting a paper,] which was indorsed by Mr. Fish over to the Secretary of the Treasury. I suppose most of you are familiar with the appearance of the bond, [exhibiting another paper.] Is it the habit of the Government to take its own money, put it into its own Treasury, hold it as its own gold, and then issue a bond acknowledging its indebtedness therefor and promising to pay it to somebody? Is it the habit of this Government to put $15,500,000 into the gold vaults of the Treasury on the one hand and add $15,500,000 to the funded debt of the Government upon the other unless that money is borrowed or received as a trust? Let me read the bond which was issued, and of which I hold a photographic copy in my hand:

The United States of America are indebted to the Hon. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State, in trust, to be held subject to the future disposition of Congress, in the sum of $15,500,000.

Now, I frankly admit that we have that last power of sovereignty—the bald, bare power that "might makes right"—that we may do as we will with whatever is in our grasp. We do not allow our citizens to sue us; so that if we make misuse of the property that is in our hands the citizen is without redress. But, gentlemen, we are morally bound by a law which presses upon judgment, which presses upon the conscience, that having received this money, having issued this bond therefor and in recognition of that trust, we shall distribute the fund, not according to whim, not according to prejudice, but in obedience to the higher, the divine law of absolute justice between the Government and its citizens, and in faithful accord with the letter and spirit of the trust under which we received it into our keeping.

I thank the House most kindly for this patient hearing upon so hot an afternoon. All that I ask the House to do is this: Put this fund at the disposal of some competent tribunal; then allow every man who has a claim, or who thinks that he has a claim, to go into that court and litigate for his right. When that is done, let the court make its award, let the nation bow thereto, and let us add to the grand example of the treaty at Washington and the tribunal at Geneva the grander example of a strong nation submitting its claim and the claims of all its citizens to the law, and bowing with equal submission to the fiat of our highest court of justice.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, there is not in the congressional district that I have the honor to represent, nor in the State of Vermont, of which it is a part, any person to my knowledge who has the slightest interest in the Geneva award. I have never heard of any constituent of mine or of any citizen of my State that would be benefited or injured in the slightest degree by the disposition to be made of this $15,500,000. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of this matter in committee, in the consideration of it here, in my action upon it throughout, I have no interest whatever except that the honor and good faith of this nation shall be maintained; that we should show not only to our own citizens but to all the world that in this grave matter we are to maintain and will maintain the highest honor and the extremest good faith.

What I have already said, Mr. Speaker, will show that I have no constituency to be flattered by a speech. There is nobody that I can especially please by what I may say in reference to this matter; and I may give that as one excuse for not having prepared any speech upon this subject. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is a work of supererogation to prepare a speech or to go into any nice learning upon this subject. For it seems to me that upon the plainest principles of common honesty and common justice this case stands without any question and without any doubt.

Now, what is the case that we have before us? During the late war between the two sections of this country the Government of the United States claimed that the government of Great Britain allowed itself to be drawn into the support and aid of that portion of our country that was undertaking to subvert our Government; that notstanding the British government was at peace with our own; notwithstanding it was its duty to abstain entirely from giving any aid or comfort to that portion of our country that was in arms against our Government, the British government did in fact do so—did in that material matter of furnishing ships of war to prey upon our commerce, furnish aid to those we were endeavoring to overcome. Although the government of Great Britain professed friendship for us, and professed to regard its treaty obligations with us, it did, as we claimed, fail to respect those obligations; and by the aid it furnished, the ships of war and the men to man ships of war to prey upon our commerce, did great damage to the citizens of the United States. We claimed it had also prolonged the war; that they had subjected the Government to a much larger expense in order to put down the rebellion. In the great variety of particulars we claimed they were liable to us as a nation, and especially we claimed they had done damage to individual citizens of the United States. We were bound as guardians of every one of our citizens to see their wrongs were redressed and the damage done to them made good.

I am not going, Mr. Speaker, into a history of this matter at all. It resulted as you know and as we all know in the treaty of Washington, and after that the award of this Geneva arbitration was made.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what was done by this board of arbitrators at Geneva? They went on seriatim. They took up the claims we presented in behalf of our Government. We claimed the war had been prolonged and the draft upon the national Treasury had been made very large in consequence of the prolongation of the war. They decided all these matters against the Government. We presented there this claim for war premiums—that a large number of our citizens had been obliged to pay increased rates of insurance in consequence of this conduct of theirs. That claim was decided by the arbitrators to stand on the general ground of general expense and damage of the war and we could not recover it, although in this bill presented by a majority of the committee, through its chairman, they have determined to include the persons who paid war premiums. These war premiums were presented before that board at Geneva, and they were eo nomine excluded from the award. We know just as well as we got this fifteen and a half million dollars, we know as conclusively we never got a shilling of that money in consequence of these war premiums, because the arbitrators expressly decided that was not a ground of recovery at all, and we could not be allowed a cent of that claim. Yet this bill reported by the majority of the committee provides as much for the payment of these war premiums as for anything else.

Now the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] who preceded me has excellently well stated the precise point upon which this whole thing is to turn. Was this an award of a gross sum of money to the United States, to be disposed of according to the good will and pleasure of the Government to whomsoever they might think best entitled or most needy, or is it a sum of money that as a great nation and guardian of the individual citizens of this country who have been injured by the action of Great Britain we have collected for them and hold for them, as much as any money my friend here ever held which he collected for a client?

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I have no time and there is no need of going into a specific history of what took place before this tribunal. The result was, one after another they decided every single claim we presented against them against us, and decided we had no claim in behalf of the Government or any individual, except for certain vessels and cargoes destroyed by three rebel cruisers they adjudged we were entitled to recover. Great Britain was found by them to have been negligent in reference to the escape of these three vessels, and for the price of every vessel and every cargo we could prove was taken and destroyed by these three rebel cruisers we were entitled to recover. Now, gentlemen who will look into the history of this award will find how it is made up. We put in the proof in reference to every one of these vessels so destroyed one after another by name, A, B, and C, the values of the vessels and their cargoes, and the arbitrators having ascertained the gross amount they computed interest on it, and that amounted to fifteen and a fraction million dollars, and in round numbers they called it fifteen and a half million dollars. There is no possibility of doubt about this. It is a matter just as clear as can be made by documentary history and proof that we have recovered just the exact price of the vessels and cargoes enumerated in the list figured up and the interest cast on that sum, and that makes this award.

Now, do we hold the money for the owners of these vessels and cargoes, or can we turn aside from the guardianship of our citizens, and say we hold this like any other money in the Treasury, to be disposed of according to our good will and pleasure, without any other limitation upon our action than our constitutional obligations? Why, Mr. Speaker, I can scarcely imagine language, I can scarcely think of words which are strong enough to express my condemnation of the utter injustice and utter bad faith of the whole principle of this bill. Why, Mr. Speaker, stealing is a soft name for it. That we should step in under the pretense that we were going to guard and protect the rights of our citizens, to see that they were made good, that we were going to stand up as their great defender and advocate, and compel the government of Great Britain to restore to us a sum of money that would make them good, and when we got it disavow the entire capacity in which we received it and in which we stood—I say, Mr. Speaker, I can scarcely frame language, and it would be scarcely proper to use language if I could think of it, which would express the condemnation and abhorrence I feel for this bill of the committee.

But, Mr. Speaker, you may go back in the history of this case. In the very outstart, long before this treaty was made, we advertised to every man who had suffered a loss, every man who had suffered by any act of theirs, inviting him to bring forward his claim and to present it here, so that we might have it in our possession and make claim for his redress at the proper time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. POLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would like the gentleman to explain to the House how insurers who got two dollars in fact for every dollar they paid out suffered a loss?

Mr. POLAND. If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience I will endeavor to explain that matter as I understand it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will be glad if he will. It is a thing I have never yet got into my head.

Mr. POLAND. Not replying to the gentleman at this moment, but going on with the train of thought I was pursuing when I was interrupted, I was saying that in order that justice might be done to our citizens at some future day, when we had put down the rebellion and were to go in for the redress of their wrongs, we invited them to send in their claims to us. Why, sir, at one time the President of the United States recommended to Congress that the Government should pay off all these claims, that they should redeem the whole of them from first to last.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. POLAND. I think I cannot yield to the gentleman, as he has two hours in which to address the House and I have only one.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My question is this: Do you believe the Government would have paid the insurance companies in that case?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly I do. I believe the Government was honest, and would pay the money to the persons for whom the Government received it. So I say that all through this whole matter we constantly recognized the right of the private owner, and that he was the man to be redressed. We made claims that were governmental, but every single one of these claims that were strictly governmental was disallowed. We only got allowed for the claims of private persons, or those the particular private owners whose vessels and cargoes were destroyed by certain specific rebel cruisers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to one clause of the treaty itself. The treaty provides that these arbitrators, when they have ascertained what particular ones of these rebel cruisers, if any, the government of Great Britain was liable for, might either figure up a sum and award a sum in gross, or they might fix the liability—they might merely determine which of these vessels the government of Great Britain was liable for, and provide for still another tribunal, a board of assessors before whom each one of these claimants should go to establish his individual claim.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask you and I should like to ask the House and my friend from Massachusetts, the chairman of the committee, what possible difference does it make, in reference to the right of these persons to receive their money, whether the tribunals awarded a gross sum for all these vessels itself, or whether it merely decided that Great Britain was liable for the acts of the Alabama, of the Florida, and the rest of the rebel cruisers for which liability was established, and sent each individual claimant to a board of assessors to ascertain his particular individual damage? It would be the same thing. The point was that they were to be allowed for. As regarded the mere form in which the arbitrators chose to put it, awarding a gross sum to cover all instead of sending each individual owner to another board of assessors to determine his claim, did that vary the rights of these persons? Not at all.

And now let me come to the question which my friend from Massachusetts put to me so triumphantly. We were allowed the price of a certain number of vessels and cargoes. Now, to whom did those vessels and cargoes belong? If there was an owner who had no insurance upon his vessel, of course it belonged to him. There is no question about that. But suppose that one of those vessels for which the claims were allowed was lost and that an insurance company had paid the owner, to whom then does it belong? Why, upon every principle of law that ever has been applied by any court, an insurance company, when they have paid the owner for the loss, are subrogated to his remedies, to his rights. If they have paid him for losses for which he was entitled to recover, why they are equally entitled to recover. They stand in his place.

Mr. SPEER. Why did the insurance companies charge extra premiums if that be so?

Mr. POLAND. The risk is greater. Why do they charge any premium at all? Why does any marine insurance company, any fire insurance company, or any other company charge a premium? Why, it is to get the means to pay their losses. But it is the universal law of insurance, fire insurance, marine insurance, and all sorts of insurance, that if a loss has been occasioned by a wrong-doer, by the illegal act of somebody, and the insurer has paid for it, he is remitted and subrogated to the right of the owner to recover against the wrong-doer. The doctrine of subrogation is a doctrine established by courts of equity. It had its origin in courts of equity, and it is founded on the broadest principles of natural justice and equity.

But, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] the insurance companies made money. What of all that, Mr. Speaker? I do not go for giving insurance companies any part of this money on the ground that I have any sympathy with insurance companies. It is not a question of sympathy. It is upon the ground that we received a portion of this money for them, we got it for them, it is their money paid into our pockets. I have no particular sympathy with them. But let me put a case to my friend. Here is a man who was the owner of five vessels, and he did not get them insured at all. He concluded that he would be his own insurer. He lost one of these vessels by a rebel cruiser and he comes in with his claim. Now, would it be any answer for the gentleman from Massachusetts or some other equally ingenious gentleman to get up and say, "We can show that upon the business you did, upon the importations you made, you realized a great deal of money, more than enough to pay for the vessel that you lost?" Is not that a perfectly parallel case in principle? Would it not be just as good an answer to the vessel-owner to tell him that he made money in the business in which he was engaged, more than the amount he lost, as it is to say to the insurance companies, "Because you made money in your general business, therefore, although you paid for this particular vessel that was lost, and for which we have received the money, why, we cannot pay you?"

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question right here. Your bill provides that money shall be paid to the mutual insurance companies, to be paid out by them to those who contributed to pay the losses.

Mr. POLAND. My bill does not provide any such thing.

Mr. FRYE. Well, the bill of the committee does. I wish to make this inquiry: If the Columbian Insurance Company receives the $800,000 which it claims, to whom under this bill, will it pay that $800,000?

Mr. POLAND. I know nothing about the Columbian Insurance Company; I never heard of it before. My friend from Maine has come in with a great variety of questions here to-day that were never heard of in the committee. He seems to be delving in a new mine, to be springing questions here which were never heard of before the committee, although we have been considering this matter in committee for the whole winter, and although finally we unanimously agreed to put in the mutual insurance companies, because a mutual insurance company is nothing but a partnership.

Suppose my friend from New York before me [Mr. COX] and myself each owns a vessel, and neither is quite able to lose the whole of it, and we agree that if either of us loses his vessel the other shall contribute to pay one-half the loss, and my friend's vessel is captured by rebel cruisers, and I pay him one-half the loss; is that any reason, if we were allowed for that vessel by these arbitrators, why he should not recover the whole sum of money and pay me one-half, or why he should not be permitted to recover his half, and I mine?

But, Mr. Speaker, this bill proposed by the committee goes entirely aside from the award, although they profess in some degree to be governed by the award, and will not exactly say that the award is to have no influence. They entirely depart from the principle of the award, because the bill not only provides for vessels destroyed by the three rebel cruisers covered by the award, but it provides for paying losses on vessels destroyed by every rebel cruiser. It provides substantially that the parties shall recover for all that was presented before the arbitrators, whether allowed by the arbitrators or not, and that, as my friend will agree, covers all. It is substantially saying that this money shall be distributed to every vessel-owner whose vessel was destroyed by any rebel cruiser, whether his case was included in the award or not.

Now I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, and every gentleman here, upon what ground is it that the owner of any vessel for which we received no money has a better claim against this fund than the man who has had his house burned during the war? Why may not gentlemen in Pennsylvania just as well come in with claims for houses destroyed in Pennsylvania, when that State was invaded by the rebels, and be paid for that loss out of the award, just as well as any vessel-owner who claims compensation for his vessel, for which we have received no money under the award?

Now my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] a member of the committee, carried this principle very far. He says the great damage was suffered by the whole people; that we should not pay this money received on this award to anybody, but that it should be kept in the Treasury and used for the benefit of the whole people.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Allow me to say that it is, with this exception: that if there are special reasons why any claimant should be paid he shall come to Congress, like the loser upon land during the war, and present his claim to the justice of Congress.

Mr. POLAND. My friend puts it upon the same grounds as pensioners and all those people who were peculiarly damaged by anything done during the war. But this bill is worse than that. It pays these persons whose vessels were lost by the action of other rebel cruisers than those named in the award, and for whose depredations England was held not liable; it pays for injuries that were somewhat of the same character and class, although there is this important difference, that we got the money for the one and did not for the other. The arbitrators decided that England should pay us for one class of claims and not for the other. I think the difference is not exactly slight. Still this bill provides for paying all the claims on an equal footing.

And the largest class that claim to be entitled to this award are people who paid war premiums; that is, people who got their vessels insured and paid the high premiums that prevailed during the war, and did not lose their vessels. In the first place, our Government presented that claim as a distinct and independent item before these arbitrators, and they just as distinctly decided as they decided anything whatever—just as distinctly as they decided that we should have pay for the value of the vessels and cargoes that were destroyed by the three rebel cruisers named—decided that these claims for war premiums were inadmissible, that they were a part of the general damage of war. Now when it is perfectly certain upon the record that we did not receive this money for them, when the arbitrators decided that that loss was not occasioned by the acts of Great Britain, that Great Britain was not liable to pay us anything for it, this bill provides for giving the largest portion of this $15,500,000 to that class of persons.

Every man who hears me knows that the price of everything went up during and because of the war. Insurance did not go up any more in proportion than everything else during the war. The price of blue coats was increased in proportion as much as the price of insurance upon the ocean. I know some gentlemen who upon that very ground could come in and make just as good an equitable and legal claim against a portion of this Geneva award fund as can those persons who now come forward with their war premiums.

So without going at all into learned details of decisions of courts, without stopping to discuss, if I could, any of these nice questions of international law, I am in favor of paying this money to the very persons for whom we received it. I do not know any principle so high, I do not know any law, either international or municipal, so high as will justify us in saying, when we have collected this money for a particular class of persons, when we have received it for them by name or by a designation, that is equally as certain as names, that we can stand upon this great high principle of sovereignty, and say that all citizenship and all private right are merged in this great national sovereignty, and we can deprive our individual citizens of money that belongs to them, and which we have received for them, and divert it to somebody else, whom we may by some fancy or color consider more meritorious and deserving people than those for whom we received the money.

As I said in the outstart, my only anxiety upon this subject is that we shall take such a course with the Geneva award, that we shall so distribute it as to fulfill that high trust with which the nation is clothed under it. Now, how do I propose to do it by the substitute which I have offered for the bill of the committee? The bill which I introduced some time ago, and which I have offered as a substitute for the bill of the committee, says nothing about whom this money shall be paid to. It provides for no insurance companies. It provides for nobody by name or class.

I say that under the treaty and the award and all the records that accompany the award showing the claims that were introduced before that commission, those that were decided in our favor and those that were decided against us, there are judicial questions proper to be determined by a court, and not proper to be determined by the Congress of the United States. It is just as much a matter to be determined by a legal tribunal, and according to those great principles of equity that have been established for generations in courts of equity, as any matter of private right between individuals. Therefore my substitute proposes what I believe to be the true doctrine and theory on this subject, that is to submit this whole question to the determination of a legal tribunal, providing for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in any case where the claimant of the Government considers that the decision of the circuit court is not the right and proper decision to be made in the case. All the questions involved are as I claim purely judicial, and can only be properly determined by a judicial tribunal. If the theory of the gentleman from Massachusetts is the true one, that the money is the money of the Government to dispose of at its own sovereign pleasure, I agree that Congress would be the proper tribunal to dispose of it.

I may say that in some respects the bill which I have introduced is identical or nearly so with the bill of the committee, because the machinery by which the committee propose to carry this matter into the courts is substantially taken from the bill I introduced. The bill originally before the committee provided for each claimant bringing an independent suit, so that there might be suits in the courts of the United States all over the country. The bill presented here by the majority of the committee adopts substantially the machinery of the bill which I introduced. Of course I do not complain of that.

But I do complain of the bill of the majority of the committee, because it takes the money that we collected for these people, for the owners of these vessels and gives it to others. If an insurance compary had paid the owner for his vessel, by every principle of law and right they stand in his place. When you undertake to go outside of that and say that in their general business of insurance they made money, you set up a false issue. You might just as well go before a jury and argue to them, when a man had established his clear legal right, that he was better off than the party upon the other side and could better afford to lose the money than the other could to pay it. Such an argument would be just as legitimate before a court and jury in a question of private right as the reason advanced by the chairman of the committee why insurance companies should not be paid—that they made money in their general business; and therefore, although we have got pay for the individual vessel that they paid their money for, we are not to give it to them because they have money enough without this.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, obtained the floor.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us go on a little longer.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I will move to adjourn at the middle of my hour if that will suit the House. I yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE.]

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen of the committee have kindly yielded to me a few moments to speak upon this question for the reason that a constituent of mine of most respectable position, and whose claims I am fully convinced are just, happens to have the greater part of what he has in the world involved in the result of this debate. I may add that when the rebel cruisers were committing their ravages upon the Atlantic Ocean, I happened to be in the service of the Government in a position which naturally made me somewhat familiar with the diplomatic correspondence that has taken place upon this subject.

Mr. Speaker, two theories are held in regard to the relations of the United States to the Geneva award. According to the first of these theories, the money received is a legal trust in such a sense as leaves no discretion whatever to our Government as to the classes to which it shall be distributed. The limitations which the Geneva tribunal found it convenient to impose upon its own action are absolutely binding upon the United States in its action. The measure there agreed upon of obligation on the part of Great Britain toward the United States is the exact measure of obligation on the part of the United States toward its citizens. In other words, this nation appeared at Geneva merely as an attorney to make collections for clients, and can honorably use no more discretion than an attorney in settling with clients.

The second theory maintains that the money was awarded and paid to the United States as such for injuries inflicted upon the United States, and brings with it no obligation limiting the freedom of its action except the general one to do what is right and just to all concerned.

First. In the endeavor to determine which of these theories is the sound one, we naturally find our first resource in the voluminous literature of our diplomatic history from the year 1861 to the year 1872, including as it does the whole history of the ravages of the British cruisers, the extended correspondence resulting therefrom, and the different attempts at negotiation ending finally in the treaty of Washington and the Geneva award. It would be unaccountable if this great mass of literature, containing the matured opinions of many of the ablest lawyers, statesmen, and diplomatists of this generation, should not give us some clew to the proper solution of the problem.

1. We glance first at the correspondence preliminary to the treaty of Washington, carried on between Mr. Seward and Mr. Adams, Mr. Adams and Lord John Russell, and other persons in high official position. All these volumes of diplomacy have this common character, that the United States everywhere appears complaining of wrongs done to this nation and demanding redress for the nation, while Great Britain everywhere appears defending herself from this charge and from no other. She is accused of unfriendliness, but of unfriendliness toward the United States and not toward private citizens. She is said to have failed in the proper discharge of her obligations as a neutral power toward a neighbor with whom she is at peace, and it is her constant endeavor to prove that the charge is not well grounded. Through all these years of attack and of defense, of accusation and of reply, of rejoinder and surrejoinder, the grievance under discussion is treated as one between two nations, as such, and it is never put forward anywhere as the grievance of private individuals. The United States never appears as an attorney making collections for clients, but comes forward as herself the wronged party and demanding redress for the injuries which have been inflicted upon her. Individual losses are indeed enumerated, but they are presented as evidence of hostile animus toward the United States and not toward the private citizen. The language of the United States to Great Britain is, "You have wronged me, and to me you are accountable. I will take care of my citizens and see that justice is done them."

2. If we turn next to the treaty of Washington, we find the same view of the question in issue prevailing there. The existing differences are spoken of as having arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty. The claims discussed are treated as claims of the United States, and the compensation contemplated is a compensation for the United States. In the seventh article we find the following provision:

> In case the tribunal find that Great Britain has failed to fulfill any duty or duties as aforesaid—

That is, duties toward the United States—

> it may, if it think proper, proceed to award a sum in gross to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for all the claims referred to it; and in such case the gross sum so awarded shall be paid in coin by the government of Great Britain to the Government of the United States at Washington within twelve months after the date of the award.

This language plainly indicates the strictly national character both of the claims and of the award made for their satisfaction.

No one who has read the treaty of Washington can have failed to notice the marked contrast in the language employed and in the provisions adopted in the case of the national claims, growing out of the ravages of British cruisers, as compared with the claims of corporations, companies, or private individuals, citizens of the United States or of Great Britain, for the satisfaction of which the treaty establishes what has been known as the mixed commission. These claims are spoken of only as the claims of private citizens; they are to be prosecuted by private citizens, either in person or by attorney, before a commission established for the purpose, and to private citizens the compensation for them is to be adjudged and paid. This contract was not accidental; it was the result of the different methods naturally employed by able and upright men in providing compensation for claims of private citizens as distinguished from those of a rational character.

3. Of that very able State paper known as the American case it may be sufficient to say that its unanswerable argument is grounded upon the same premises that have been previously maintained. The United States is an injured nation; she demands redress as such; and the tribunal at Geneva is urged to award a sum in gross as a just compensation to the United States for the injuries and losses of which she complains.

> The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two governments, and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross. In the discussion of this question, and in the treatment of the entire case, you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded, or what may be recovered, in the event of the appointment of the board of assessors mentioned in the tenth article of the treaty. It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property, alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution It is expected that all such committal be avoided in the arguments of counsel.

It is nowhere assumed in these instructions that American citizens may not have claims which should be paid, but it is assumed that the Geneva tribunal is not the proper court to try these claims, and that the United States reserves to herself the right to examine and decide upon them.

5. The American argument before the tribunal is conducted in the true spirit. Our counsel carefully refrained from making the committal which the Secretary of State deprecated, and urged our claims upon the tribunal as strictly national in character. I quote only two of the many passages to this effect from this convincing and well-considered paper:

> That these claims are all preferred by the United States as a nation against Great Britain as a nation, and are to be so computed and paid, whether awarded as "a sum in gross," under the seventh article of the treaty, or awarded for assessment of amounts, under the tenth article.

And again:

> This principal question having been determined, if Great Britain is held responsible for these injuries, the people of the United States expect a just and reasonable measure of compensation for the injuries as thus adjudicated, in the sense that belongs to this question of compensation as one between nation and nation.

6. The language and spirit of the decision and award itself are in entire harmony with the views here advocated. The national character of the issue is maintained throughout, and a sum in gross of fifteen and a half million dollars is awarded to the United States. No claim of a company, corporation, or private citizen is considered as such, and there is no intimation of a wish even to limit the discretion of the United States in distributing the amount among its own citizens. The agent and counsel of Great Britain expressed no wish to have any such limitation imposed upon our Government, nor would our representatives have submitted to such an attempt had it been made. It is indeed true that carefully prepared tables of individual losses were presented by our agents to the tribunal, but they were offered only as affording some imperfect measure of the wrong done to the United States. Even this purpose they accomplished only in part. Mr. Cushing informs us in his Treaty of Washington "that the result reached did not accept as binding either the tables presented by the United States, or the deductions therefrom claimed by Great Britain;" and that "one of the arbitrators expressly declared that in arriving at a conclusion the arbitrators were not to be regarded as making an assessment, or confining themselves to the schedules, estimates, or tables, of either of the two governments." Indeed, so little special consideration was given by the tribunal to the schedules offered that it felt no compunction, while making the award, in declaring that all claims known as Alabama claims, whether presented to the notice of the tribunal or not, were fully and finally settled.

It may be added in passing that it is a little remarkable, considering how much trouble in the exercise of our own discretion the Geneva award is supposed to have saved us, that so little is definitely known as to the manner in which the award was reached or what it was really for. If the award was meant to be our guide, it must be admitted that it was rather a poor one. It is said that we are allowed both principal and interest. But how much of the sum awarded is principal; how much is interest; at what rate is the interest computed? No one can tell us. How much of the fifteen and a half millions is for the ravages of the Alabama; how much for injuries inflicted by the Florida; how much for damage done by the Shenandoah and other vessels to the end of the list? No one knows. The arbitrators did not know. Still less can we find in the award any trace of the proportion intended for individual ships destroyed, and of course personal claimants utterly disappear. Is it then credible that the decision of such a question as whether Great Britain was responsible for damage done by the Shenandoah before visiting Melbourne had anything to do with the amount awarded? I think not. I have an impression, which may be right or may be wrong, in regard to the manner in which the sum in gross was reached. Several persons have been guessing about the matter, and one man's guess may perhaps be considered as good as another's. As long ago as May, 1864, Mr. Cobden had stated in the House of Commons that the direct losses to the United States from the ravages of the British cruisers amounted to three millions sterling, or $15,000,000. This statement was quoted with approval by several leading English journals, and was hailed on our side of the Atlantic as evidence of candor and fairness in the great opponent of the corn laws. The opinion expressed by Mr. Cobden was brought conspicuously to the notice of the tribunal in the American case; and I am inclined to think that when its members began to look about for such a sum as would be fair for both parties, finding that the amount of three millions sterling was somewhat fixed in the popular approval, decided upon that amount, or a sum sufficiently near it, as likely to be satisfactory to all concerned, at the same time that they deemed it just and reasonable.

Second. But it is contended that in the very nature of the case our action is circumscribed by the limitations of the tribunal. It is said that we subjected ourselves to these by the very act of going to Geneva. We have no longer any discretion; we can no longer ask what is right, what is just, what is fair, who were actual sufferers, or who merely pretend to be such. We have only left us the poor privilege of groping darkly after some rule of conduct in the Geneva award. It is urged that we submitted the whole question to Geneva. I answer, what question? The question how much, and upon what grounds England should pay us. The question on what principles we should settle with our citizens was never submitted. There is no hint of such a purpose in all the many thousand pages where our grievances are discussed. Indeed, as we have seen, express instructions to the contrary were forwarded to our counsel at Geneva. Great Britain never asked that that question should be considered by the tribunal; never expressed any interest in it, and, so far as appears, has never felt any. The tribunal never discussed it, and imposed no condition upon the United States except that it should receive the sum awarded in full of all demands. Its final words to us in substance were, "Take this; do what you please with it, but ask for no more."

1. But it is urged, with some warmth, that by presenting the claims of any class at Geneva we placed ourselves under obligation, in case those claims should be recognized, to pay them out of the fund received. This would no doubt be true had our Government made any promise to that effect either at Geneva or to its own citizens. But it at all times carefully abstained from any committal of this kind. It invited all American citizens to file their claims with the Department of State without committing itself upon the question whether it would finally pay them, and it laid all these claims before the Geneva tribunal, intending that they should serve as some measure of the losses of the United States, and be suggestive of the sum to be finally awarded. We remember that the Secretary of State himself declared "that there might be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the case of insurer and insured." But of this the tribunal had the same means of judging as the Secretary of State, and hence were not imposed upon by the claims presented.

2. There remains therefore but this rule for the United States to observe in the distribution of the Geneva award: to do what, all things considered, is most just and fair among its own citizens; and this can only mean to compensate as far as practicable all actual sufferers from injuries inflicted by the British cruisers whose losses have not been recovered in some other way. Could it be shown that the burden of injury has been divided equally among the whole population, the true method clearly would then be to cover the award into the Treasury to be applied to the payment of national obligations or to the reduction of taxation. But as this is not the case, the duty of the Government plainly is to indemnify to the best of its ability the real sufferers. It should pay for actual losses by the Shenandoah before going to Australia, as well as afterward, and for losses by the other cruisers, whether included in the Geneva award or not. It should pay the insurance companies so far as they can prove that their losses were not made up to them by increased war premiums. It should compensate those who paid such premiums so far as they can make it appear that they were not indemnified by larger freights and larger profits upon cargoes. The same principle should be applied to all other classes of sufferers. In fine, the nation can meet the high responsibilities resting upon it in this case only by calling into exercise the noblest attribute, whether of nations or of individuals, the attribute of justice. Let this be done, and no real sufferer will be left without compensation. In the words of one of our counsel at Geneva: "Whether the sum awarded be adequate depends in my opinion on whether distribution be made among actual losers only and citizens of the United States."

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I yield for one moment to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that a statement of the insurance companies, mutual and stock, which I hold in my hand may be ordered to be printed as a document, and also printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The statement is as follows:

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I now yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BURLEIGH.]

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Speaker, if any gentlemen residing in the interior of the country think that they have no interest in this question, that only those who are concerned in navigation on the ocean are interested in it, I desire to say to those gentlemen that they and their constituents have as much interest in this award as three-fourths or nine-tenths of my constituents have. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] had said that these ship-owners who present their claims here are all rich, worth on an average $18,000 each. Why did he not say to the House that the ownership of many of these vessels is cut up into eighths, sixteenths, perhaps thirty-seconds or sixty-fourths. If the gentleman will come to my State, I will show him how these ship-owners live, and what many of them are doing now. And then let the gentleman go with me to where he is accustomed to go, into the gilded palaces in which the insurance companies do their business, on Broadway and State street; and into the brown-stone front houses on Fifth avenue and Beacon Hill.

Mr. Speaker, when the first vessel was captured by rebel cruisers—a ship belonging to individuals in my State—there was great interest throughout the country among ship-owners to know whether the insurance companies would pay that loss or not. The ship-owners had insured their property against the dangers of the sea and they claimed that the companies were liable for the loss. The insurance companies on the other hand claimed that such a loss was extraordinary and that the companies were not liable. The court sustained the insurance companies; and the companies did not pay any losses of that character until they had collected from the ship-owners war premiums sufficient in amount to cover the losses as they occurred.

Then was the time, Mr. Speaker, that the ship-owners of this country were between the upper and nether millstone, as it were. To lose their ship was ruin; to pay the extraordinary and, as it proved to be, exorbitant war premium, was also ruin. Many of them perhaps were compelled to put their ships under a foreign flag or see their property vanish like the dew before the morning sun. Others, more patriotic, having sailed under the old flag all over the world, could not consent to see their vessels go under a foreign flag; they paid out their money and had their vessels captured until their whole property was swept away. Thus the merchant marine of this country, that had before the war done the larger share of the carrying trade of the world, that had been the nursery for our seamen and the envy of other countries, is now classed in regard to numbers as fourth among the maritime nations of the earth.

Sir, my people conceive that the Geneva award was given to this country to remunerate the ship-owners of this country who had their vessels swept from the sea and their property destroyed by the rebel cruisers fitted out and sailing, in a manner, under the protection and in the interest of Great Britain.

Now, sir, the question before us is, who shall have this money? Shall the people who had ships, and now have neither ships nor money, be excluded? Sir, many of these men who are to-day struggling in poverty on account of these losses would, if they had their own again, club together and once more launch their barks upon the treacherous element.

Mr. Speaker, these men should be paid; at least they should not be left out in the cold. They built up our merchant marine; they maintained a nursery for our seamen without any expense to the Government; and when the hour of conflict came they were too patriotic to abandon the flag, but paid out their money until it would have been better for them if they had allowed their ships to sink or be captured.

Sir, we hear a good deal said here about law. Now, sir, I understand that we here are law-makers, and that we have a special case before us. Let us so make the law that it will do justice in this case. It is in the interest of the nation; it is in the interest of those that favor cheap transportation; it is in the interest of those who favored deep water at the mouth of the Mississippi River; it is in the interest of every member upon this floor and his constituents I plead, as well as in the interest of those who have done business upon the water and who go down to the sea in ships. If the strong hand of the Government shall succeed in giving these people their own again, it will build up our merchant marine again to be our pride and the envy of the world. It will be the means of maintaining a nursery of seamen for our Navy without any expense to the Government. It will dot every sea with our white sails and build up our trade and commerce in every part of the world, among civilized and uncivilized nations, and fly those "Stars and Stripes" we already love so well to see wherever we are, the flag of our common country, now, thank God! no longer counted as the emblem of a nation of slaveholders.

SALLIE T. LEE.

Mr. HAZELTON, of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3660) granting a pension to Sallie T. Lee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SCHOONER ALBA.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3661) to change the name of the schooner Alba; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to give an American register to the schooner Alba, late of Saint John's, New Brunswick, a British vessel owned by Joseph Ross and William G. Brown, citizens of the United States, wrecked on the Ipswich (Massachusetts) beach in April last past, and now having American owners, who have bought and repaired her.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. TRUEHEART.

Mr. RUSK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3662) granting a pension to George W. Trueheart, late private Company F, Sixty-seventh New York Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

FREEPORT, FLORIDA.

Mr. PURMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3663) to establish a port of entry and delivery at Freeport, Florida; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

TAMPA, FLORIDA.

Mr. PURMAN also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3664) to establish a port of entry and delivery at Tampa, Florida; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. BASS. I ask unanimous consent to take up and put on its passage a bill (H. R. No. 2909) to declare the bridge across the Niagara River authorized by the act of Congress approved June 30, 1870, a post-route. It comes unanimously recommended from the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The bill, which was read, provides that the modifications in the plans of the bridge authorized by the act approved on the 30th day of June, 1870, as stated in the report of the board of engineers of the War Department, dated February 7, 1871, are hereby appoved; and said bridge as constructed is hereby declared to be a lawful structure, and an established post-route for the mails of the United States.

Mr. BASS. I ask that the following papers be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The chief clerk of the War Department, in the absence of the Secretary of War, has the honor to transmit to the House of Representatives, for the information of the Committee on Railways and Canals, report of the Chief of Engineers and Major F. Harwood, as to the merits of House bill No. 2909, "to declare the bridge across the Niagara River, authorized by the act of Congress approved June 30, 1871, a post-route."

Concurring in the views expressed in these reports, the Department finds no objection to the bill.

H. T. CROSBY,
Chief Clerk.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 6, 1874.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, D. C., June 3, 1874.

SIR: The letter of the Hon. Lyman K. Bass, of the 21st of May last, requesting, in behalf of the House Committee on Railways and Canals, the opinion of the War Department as to the merits of H. R. bill No. 2909 "To declare the bridge across the Niagara River, authorized by the act of Congress approved June 30, 1870, a post-route," referred to this office for report, is herewith respectfully returned.

The letter of Mr. Bass (with inclosed bill) was referred to Major F. Harwood, Corps of Engineers, and a copy of his report thereon is herewith submitted. His views are concurred in by me.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General and Chief of Engineers.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Buffalo, N. Y., May 29, 1874.

GENERAL: I have the honor to return herewith, as directed, the papers sent to me under date May 22, 1874, and to report in regard to bill H. R. No. 2909, that I see no objection whatever to its terms.

The international bridge over the Niagara River at Buffalo is finished, has been in use for some time, and is in my opinion a very satisfactory structure, fully worthy to be legalized as an established post-route. It should be remarked in this connection that certain modifications to the bridge and approaches, not noted in the report of the board of engineer officers of February 7, 1871, but subsequently given in detail in my report of October 10, 1871, and understood to have received the approval of the honorable the Secretary of War, have been effected since the final adjournment of the board. As these in my opinion are not only unobjectionable but rather advantageous, I see no objection to the bill on their account.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

F. HARWOOD,
Major of Engineers.

To the CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
United States Army, Washington, D. C.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BASS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1934) for the relief of Pat. O. Hawes;

An act (H. R. No. 773) to reduce the area of the military reservation of Fort Sanders, and providing for the survey of said reservation as reduced;

An act (H. R. No. 955) for the relief of J. L. Tedrow, of Clarke County, Iowa;

An act (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits, and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto;

An act (H. R. No. 2090) for the relief of Jacob Harding;

An act (H. R. No. 3160) in reference to the operations of the shipping commissioners act approved June 7, 1872; and

An act (H. R. No. 2538) to legalize and establish a ponton railway-bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien, and to authorize the construction of a similar bridge at or near Clinton, Iowa.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 735) to increase the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have been totally disabled.

An act (H. R. No. 2453) to increase pensions in certain cases.

An act (H. R. No. 3237) to authorize "The First National Bank of Seneca" to change its name.

An act (H. R. No. 3359) fixing the time for the election of Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania to the Forty-fourth Congress.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 107) providing for the termination of the treaty between the United States and His Majesty the King of the Belgians, concluded at Washington July 17, 1858.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the same committee, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 881) fixing the times of holding the circuit court of the United States in the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. SWANN in place of Mr. HANCOCK, excused from service on the conference on the deficiency bill.

SOLDIERS OF THE MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. HERNDON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD some remarks on the bill (H. R. No. 2403) to grant pensions to the soldiers of the Mexican war.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House now take a recess until half past seven.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The session of the House this evening, by previous order, is to be for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. HARRISON, will be in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

And thereupon (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HARRISON.) The House, pursuant to order, meets this evening for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

FREE TRADE AND DIRECT TAXATION.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, for near ten years the people of my State have imposed upon me the duties of a Representative in this body. I hope it will not be considered immodest to say that my constant study has been to guard their interests. My associates here will doubtless concede that I have exhausted little time of the House, but in a quiet and I hope inoffensive way have attempted, by voting on all public questions, to do justice to my constituencies. Want of confidence in my power to advance the views I entertain upon public questions effectively has to a large extent restrained me from prominent action.

Another reason is, however, that for the greatest portion of the time I have been honored with the confidence of the people the public mind has overwhelmingly tended to the assertion of theories of government that were contrary to all my convictions of right. A terrible civil war had swung the country from its old moorings and left as its legacies a long train of evils detrimentally affecting the morals of the people and the policies of the country. While passion was triumphant the tongue of a prophet would have had no power. The conviction that their passions had cooled, that they now realize existing wrongs, and that they are willing candidly and without prejudice to consider the state of the country, is explanation of my departure from a past line of action.

It will be my effort to prove that the present chaotic condition of our business interests and the unsettled and dangerous situation of many of the States is attributable to unwise legislation, looking to the overthrow of the power of the people and the assumption of their rightful authority by the central Government.

That the policies of the republican party proceed upon false theory, which, instead of leaving the people free to as great an extent as is consistent with public safety, have resulted in aggressive restraints upon them antagonistic to republican institutions and violative of all the fundamental maxims of free government. The lethargic state of the public mind, superinduced by false assumptions of authority by those in power, has enabled monopoly, built by class legislation, dictated by the enemies of the people, to take control of their affairs, and their substance is being absorbed and their liberty imperilled.

The most common but at the same time one of the most profound maxims is, that necessity is the creator of development. To make a people great, we must impose responsibilities on them, must bring the aggregate human mind upon the theater of thought, must make it their interest to carefully deliberate upon the public welfare. Every law that unnecessarily relieves them of responsibility is a law against freedom and intellectual progress. A people little governed are greatly blessed.

The teaching of the republican party is that the central Government shall think for the people. Every energy of my life has been devoted to the assertion and vindication of the great truth that the people, to be free, must think for themselves.

The father who assumes control of the mental movements of his child, and by superior experience and mistaken affection destroys his self-reliance, ruins his child. A government that relieves the people from thought is an enemy to intellectual progress and the ally of despotism. The law of competition in thought is the foundation upon which progress and freedom rest.

Class legislation clothes its beneficiaries with the instrumentalities of power, facilitates combinations of capital, erects monopolies, and is the corner-stone of despotism, and its creature, protection, whether exhibiting itself in paternalism in government, or the erection of classes, is the delusive snare that is held out to entrap the people. One of the maxims of Bismarck is, that those who hold the money-bags are the masters of the people. The protective legislation of republican rule has forced the money-bags to the control of the banker, who, by education and interest, is the enemy of labor.

It is my purpose, in as fair and impartial a manner as history will justify, to present the record of the republican party since the conclusion of the war, and, to the extent of my humble ability, point out its errors, and indicate remedies. In the hour of conflict public servants may be excused for departure from law and principle. For that reason a generous judgment would not hold them responsible for their action during its existence, but when it has passed away the highest duty of those in authority is to allay the passions it begot and conduct the people into the pathways of peace and security. Has the republican party, who have had unrestrained control of the nation since its conclusion, been governed by this simple, inflexible rule of public conduct? Is it not true that a policy of hate and proscription in every recurring political contest is promulgated by their leaders to excite the passions of the people and divert the public mind from the encroachments of the money and political despotisms?

During the war the people of the Northwest, the section I have the honor to represent, were educated by the morbid demand for their products the war created and its attendant prosperity to believe that republican administration would make that prosperity permanent. What is now the condition of the Northwest? An inquiring man entering one of its rich regions desiring to know the condition of a people so bountifully blessed by Providence would ask, what is the debt, private and public, and who constructed and own the vast systems of rail that cross the country at every point? He would be answered that the private debt, all created since the war, was immense; that it was represented by loans made by capitalists of protected districts; that it was secured by mortgages on the homes of the people, and that the crop of mortgages were rapidly encroaching on the bounty the fields awarded to the constant toil of the laboring and agricultural class; that the railways were built largely by subsidies donated by the people; that burdensome indebtedness had been assumed by the counties for their construction, and by some mysterious process the bonds of the counties had drifted to the possession of the capitalists of protected districts. At the conclusion of the war the people of the Northwest were out of debt. After ten years of republican administration, in peace, that people occupying God's richest heritage are impoverished, their energies crippled, and their property depreciated in value.

Further investigation shows that the control and ownership of the vast system of rail of the Northwest was in capitalists of protected districts in distant States; that they were by them consolidated and centralized.

The time was when western lines of railway were independent, were instrumental in competition between the lines for the markets, and secured living rates to the people for their labor; but consolidation being accomplished competition is crushed, and the roads, instead of responding to and sympathizing with the prosperity of the West, answer the greedy demands of capital, centralized and produced for classes in distant States by protection.

It may be said that the publication of the truth tends to sectionalize the country, that its utterance is unpatriotic. How much more unpatriotic are those who use all the instrumentalities that party or money can afford to fasten a system on the country that robs those upon whom its prosperity depends to fatten the stock-jobbers and gamblers, and to deposit power over the whole producing and laboring classes in numberless diverse petty and soulless despotisms?

The consolidation of our railroads could not have been accomplished in so short a period without the rapid production and centralization of money; protection is the author of both evils. The redundancy of money produced by it for a class in a section sought avenues of investment, and stocks being the most available, the different lines of railroad were swallowed up by that class, and consolidation followed.

Let it not be charged, Mr. Speaker, that I am actuated by hostility to any section. The agriculturists and the laborers of the sections in which these beneficiaries of the Government reside representing as they do a large preponderance of the population, are as much the victims of the system as the people of the same class in other sections.

Investigation will demonstrate that the producing and laboring interests in those localities are in no more flourishing condition than in the past, and that the centralization of money in the few has erected class distinctions founded upon wealth built by the toil of the people, proscriptive and degrading in their character and unrepublican in their spirit; that protection is as well the enemy of the people in the protected districts as elsewhere. My hostility proceeds not against a section, but a class; not against the people, but against their legalized robbers.

One of the results of the unbridled control of this class is the continued oppression of the people of the lately rebellious States. They realize that so long as they can, by force, artifice, or fraud, prevent an expression of the intelligence of those States, so long as those States are represented by adventurers having no interest in their prosperity, just so long can they perpetuate wrong against the whole people.

The rebellion was bred by a wrong that was created and legalized by the nation. Slavery consolidated the hostile action of the people of the South for the perpetuation of slavery, and through the passions its assumed interest and menaced authority developed, the South was precipitated into war against the Government. The present is no appropriate time to discuss the rights or the wrongs of those engaged in the conflict; happily for humanity its deadly recitals belong to the past. Deeds of heroism, equaling if not surpassing any written or unwritten, were daily occurrences in both the hostile camps. Those who measure a people by their martial spirit, or the skill of their commanders, will on either side find that high courage and genius they admire.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, I have no admiration for war; that it is my pride and I believe my highest duty here and everywhere to use every endeavor to avert it. The war having passed away, and the people being again reunited in a common interest, my effort in the past has been, and in the future will be, to still the unholy passions it begot.

The South and the Northwest are allies by every physical, financial, and political interest. Before the war unimpeded natural laws had established reciprocal relations, which protected and enriched each of the sections; the producer of cotton and tobacco was the consumer and competitor with the world for the products of the Northwest; but the war, with all its attendant horrors, was less destructive of the moral and material welfare of the whole country than subsequent administration of southern affairs.

It will be my attempt to demonstrate that the passions that have been brought into play since the conclusion of the war have been used by the despotic interests that now have the people under their feet, as one of the instrumentalities for the perpetuation of their power. They shrewdly calculated that it could only be secured by dividing those who ought to be friends, by warring on that reciprocity that the Almighty, by natural law, has made eternal. They realized that the genius and nobility of a people were never crushed by hostile conflict in the open field, that the slow processes of a degrading despotism, established over a prostrate people, were the instruments to crush their souls and destroy their patriotism and rising energy.

The generosity that soldiers proclaimed at the conclusion of the war was unsuited to the mad passions of the home patriots, the unholy ambition of political adventurers, and to the deadly avarice of the money-changer, who hoped to fatten through the continued misery of the people of the rebellious States.

Adventurers flocked to the South, who instead of attempting to accommodate society and labor to the new order of things; instead of encouraging the people to a combined effort to resurrect their country from the ruin of the conflict; instead of attempting to inaugurate a feeling of confidence between the lately freed black population and the white people of the South, exhausted every artifice to divide them. Professing friendship for the black, they plundered their States and robbed their people.

It is a grateful task to testify to exceptions. Many went South seeking homes and inspired by an honest desire to aid its people. Eminent among that class I may be allowed to refer to Governor Walker. The old State of Virginia has been blessed by wise and patriotic administration; her credit has been preserved and her treasury protected. Elected a Jeffersonian republican, he could only preserve her people from the rapacity of plunderers by offering defiance to the mandates of the spurious republicanism of the present. Under great difficulties he fought a noble and successful fight, and has added another brilliant page to the history of the Old Dominion, and has won the admiration of his countrymen. But the general policy of the past ten years has been, through carpet-bag rule, directed to the protection of one race—to the effort to change every moral, social, philosophical, Christian, and political principle, thereby subjecting the superior to the control of the inferior race. Let us test the wisdom of the system by a trite question. What man is there, if he had business to transact of a private character in any one of the States beleaguered by carpet-baggism, who would submit its control to the negro? If not, why willing that the highest considerations affecting the present as well as future generations should, by the exercise of national influence, be deposited with him?

The answer of republicans may be that they have no faith in the white people of the South. Have not these people signalized their greatness in the past in the field, the forum, and the closet? Their ancestry largely contributed in the creation and protection of those manifold blessings that embellished our country, until factions took the place of parties, and passion, instead of reason, assumed the empire of the public mind. Do you not realize that there must be harmony in the South between the races before prosperity can be assured? And does not the nation suffer when any of its sections are impoverished?

The white people of the South are without arms, without money, and without organization. They have in their midst a large population of a different race with equal political privileges, all believed to be loyal by the most fanatical. Is it not true that rebellion against constituted authority is not only impracticable, but impossible?

Let me further test the wisdom of the system. Will it be denied that the debts of those States, without corresponding benefits, have been increased near $100,000,000? That their people, black and white, are manacled by them, not only for the present but for future generations? That fleeing governors and plundered States are the visible evidence of its operations? Will it be denied that if, after the war, the people had been remitted to the control of those States; that if the beneficent influence of our institutions had, free from national interposition, been allowed to take their natural course, the scoundrels who robbed their treasuries, and divided and corrupted their people would have been purged from their bosom?

I have been too long in public life not to be aware that the enunciation of the truth in regard to the administration of southern affairs will be a pretext for numberless calumnies; that all the machinery that hate, supported by the power of the monopolists, will be put in motion for the destruction of any man who has the boldness to avow it; that the war, with all its attendant horrors, will be vividly portrayed and elaborated by the money-gluttons and the political and religious pharisees that have cursed the South, and through that the country, for the last eight years.

I believe, however, that the time has now arrived when the suffering that the general system of public administration has entailed will justify a full exposition of its ruinous tendencies.

The people have awakened to the reality that there is an invisible dagger being plunged into their vitals; that the rising energy and patriotism of the South is crushed under the heel of faction sustained by the power of the Government; that the prosperity of the South and the nation are relative, and that both are victims; that their energies and their labor, their products, and their natural resources, are bound in the manacles of political and money centralization erected into a despotic colossus by the insidious but iron grasp of protection.

The career of protection in its political and financial aspects carries with it the most valuable instruction to mankind; its mission has been to perpetuate fraud, encourage ignorance, and establish despotism.

Its history is written in the galling despotism it erected over the French, relieving the nobility and the priestcraft from the burdens of government until the smothered discontent of the people, resulting from ages of oppression, volcano-like, burst its chains and appalled the world by its violence; in the grasping avarice and inhuman control of England over her East India colonies, enslaving a large portion of the human race, without pretext, to secure the perpetuation of her protected kings and nobility, impoverishing a people who were rich, reducing to misery those who had been happy, while export duties from and import duties to her colonies filled the coffers of her country; is written in the history of the last ten years in this country by the overflowing treasuries of the protected class, and by the poverty of the agriculturist and laborer; by the tendency of the times to the establishment of monopolies and the destruction of private enterprise, by the erection of colossal fortunes in the few, and the impoverishment of the many. In all its career, in every department, crime stalks in its companionship, and injustice and fraud are its results.

Mr. Speaker, the next subject to which I desire to direct the attention of the House is the management of our financial affairs. The authors of the policy of exemption of the public debt from taxation claim that it was necessary to float the securities and provide the means to carry on the war. Certainly, nothing but the most vital necessity could ever have justified it. The manifold evils that have flowed from this legislative protection of capital should forever admonish mankind that war, however successful in its element of force, is always dangerous to the liberties of a people. The tendency of such a debt is to draw capital from its legitimate fields; retard the development of all the material interests; to raise the value of money, cheapen labor, and destroy the power of the people; centralize capital; make it dangerously remunerative; establish classes, and overthrow liberty.

These are the general tendencies that have resulted from the exemption of the public debt from taxation. Let us for a short time consider in detail its practical operations upon the people and our system of government. Assuming that it is conceded that competition lies at the foundation of material development, it centralizes two thousand millions of capital, exempted from all public burdens, and diverts it from all the channels of public usefulness, compels the people from their hard earnings to pay a higher rate of interest to its holders than is paid by any civilized or respectable nation on earth. It was wrung from those in authority by the shylocks when the Government was in extremity.

The national banking system, a creature organized for the protection and centralization of capital, the security for the issue of which are these exempted bonds, another creature for the centralization and protection of capital, was summoned from the public portfolios as a panacea for all our financial evils, a calm exposure of the practical workings of which, in my judgment, exhibits it as a plan for universal robbery by the money power centralized by republican legislation.

It submits the control of the finances to the bankers, whose education and whose interest it is to make money high and labor cheap. It centralizes three hundred and fifty millions of our circulating medium; withdraws it, by legislative protection, from legitimate competition with the remainder of the circulation; drives from the field all competition by private enterprise in the sale of money to the people; absorbs not only the cash but all the credit business, involving an amount many times greater than the business accomplished by the circulation; forces near half the reserves, by the operation of the laws controlling its organization, to the money centers, by authorizing certificates of redemption banks to be held by the country banks as reserves, thus presenting to the banks representing the agricultural districts the necessity of sending their money to the centers to make it profitable, the result of which is to make money redundant in the centers and deplete all the localities from which our wealth is derived; forces the money thus sent, not demanded by legitimate business interests, into stock gambling; creates watered stocks on railroads, to pay the interest on which higher rates of transportation are charged against the people; develops what are known as corners against pork, corn, wheat, and every other product by locking up the money and making them cheap when the producer holds them, and, after their purchase, locks them up against the consumer, and thereby exacts an additional and exorbitant toll against the half-starving and poorly paid laboring population; brings the people engaged in the production of wealth in competition with reckless gamblers on Wall street for the use of money; raises the rates of interest against all the valuable classes by creating fancy stocks and fancy corners, competitors for the consumption of the circulation, and finally, after withdrawing, according to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, from the country districts $113,000,000 of the money of the people into this shameless conspiracy against their welfare this republican financial bubble bursts, and leaves the people to the innocent amusement of holding their empty money-bags, and the redemption banks—the pets of this pet so-called republican system of finance—to which morally the faith of the Government is pledged by republican legislation, refuse the payment of the pittance deposited for safe-keeping by the laborer.

A paternal Government in their fatherly kindness have centralized all the circulation and all the credits of finance in the money-dealers; have destroyed by their legislation every vestige of competition in the sale of money to the people; have kindly given the money-dealers first 6 per cent. in gold, payable semi-annually, of the money wrung by taxation from the blood and sweat of the producers of wealth, and given to the money-dealer 90 per cent. of $395,000,000 of national-bank notes without interest, which the money-dealer loans to the people at the rates governing in the locality in which the bank is situated; have, independent of any explainable necessity, established a combination of middle-men authorized by national paternal republican legislation to receive as a bounty for their robbery of the producer and the degradation of the laborer the annual stipend out of their hard earnings of $23,700,000 in gold, payable semi-annually.

The national banks centralize money. The centralization of money if it does not result from the demands of legitimate business creates wild speculation. Wild speculation creates stock-gambling. Stock-gambling produces watered stocks, and watered stocks in railroads demanding their interest call on the farmer, mechanic, merchant, and laborer to pay his proportion to maintain a policy of paternal protection.

Boards of brokers are established in the city of New York whose business it is to sell and buy Government securities as well as fancy stocks on margins, and these securities, exempted from taxation, are used by the bankers to withdraw a large portion of the other personal wealth from State, county, and municipal taxation. A few days before assessment the holders of money in banks and otherwise telegraph to their brokers in New York to purchase for them Government bonds to an amount nearly equal to all their capital, and when the assessor comes they return him about one-twentieth of their real capital for taxation, and the other nineteen-twentieths in Government securities. By this scheme of finance, fostered and practiced by the national banks, full one-half of all the other personal property in credits and circulation is drawn from local support, and the farmer, the merchant, the mechanic, and the laborer are required to make up this dishonest subtraction of values from the assessor by the additional tolls that are imposed on their goods, lands, and stock.

Mr. Speaker, the honorable Senator from the State of Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] in the course of remarks lately made by him, I suppose sounded the battle-cry of his followers. He says:

> The facilities and benefits of the national banking system should be extended to all the States alike, thus relieving it of its present sectional character, and that the restriction upon the amount of national-bank circulation should be removed to relieve it of its monopoly feature.

And afterward, in explanation of what he deemed its objectionable feature, says:

> I am a friend of the national banking system, believing it the best the country has ever had, and wish to relieve it of a blemish which is fast making it unpopular, and if continued will make it odious. This is its monopoly feature, and those who seek to preserve this feature are the worst enemies of the system. Even if the national banking facilities had been divided among the States according to the provisions of the law, it would be a monopoly. But when the law was violated, and a few States seized upon the greater part, almost to the exclusion, and to the great detriment of others, there is added to the monopoly an injustice which it is the part of wisdom in the friends of the banks to abolish as soon as possible.

He lays down the proposition, in substance, that its only defect results from the restriction upon its general adoption, and assumes that when that is abolished the elasticity in currency which he so much admires will be accomplished.

Let us for a limited period investigate the results of this scheme. I undertake to say that its only object is to force the greenback, which costs the people nothing, out of circulation, substitute national-bank issue therefor, and perpetuate the authority of bankers, sustained by legislative sympathy and legislative bounties. That it is a scheme of the money-holder to further monopolize control over the capital and credit of the country, and further dominate the laboring, agricultural, mercantile, and mechanical classes; that its result will be to force our people first to pay off a non-interest-bearing obligation. If the elastic financial currency policy means anything, it means that in times of scarcity it will increase, in times of redundancy contract. Is there any man wild enough to suppose that after banks are established under the national banking law, with the general privilege projected by the Senator's plan that the national banker, to accommodate public necessity, will in the case of redundant circulation patriotically close the doors of his bank and quit business?

Is it not apparent that this scheme means that on each recurring redundant period the Government will retire and pay off greenbacks, and that on each recurring period of scarcity more patriotic bankers will be called to the front to meet public exigencies; and that the whole scheme, when stripped of the mysteries in which its authors envelop it, is to compel the people to pay, first, a non interest-bearing-debt and relieve capital of the competition that its circulation affords?

The national bankers, taking advantage of the distress among the people created by their own manipulations, are attempting to further centralize the circulation and the credits; to so manacle all the industries and control labor that all effort to throw off its fatal embrace will be futile and ineffectual.

Assuming that there can be no question that it would force greenbacks out of circulation, what is its direct result upon the people? If the Government retires interest-bearing bonds, the people are saved the interest. There are four hundred millions of greenbacks, costing nothing. If an additional four hundred millions was issued and devoted to the purchase of bonds now deposited for the security of bank circulation, it would save the people twenty-four millions annually.

The Senator has rather a narrow view of the term "monopoly." If a system of national legislation that gives 6 per cent. interest in gold, paid by the people on $394,000,000, and 90 per cent. of that amount of a circulation without interest, and only subjected to a tax of 1 per cent. on the circulation, is not a monopoly in its broadest and most dangerous sense, I fail to understand its meaning. The project of the Senator, if carried out, increases it to eight hundred millions in a short time, forces the people to first pay off a non-interest-paying debt when interest-paying debt is existing, destroys all competition in the circulation, and places the whole finances of the country in the hands of middle-men, pensioned, if free banking is established, out of the sweat and labor of the people, to near fifty millions of gold annually.

If an inquisition of lunacy were summoned to determine the state of a man's mind who, when it was optional with him to postpone the payment of $10,000, either by the execution of evidences of indebtedness, bearing 6 per cent. in gold interest, payable semi-annually or the execution of evidences of indebtedness without interest, and that man should select the interest-paying security as the most expedient to promote his financial welfare, are there twelve men on this broad earth who would not decide him a man of unsound mind and appoint a conservator? The Senator, managing the business of the people, proposes to pay off first the non-interest-paying debt.

The Senator further says:

> But I dispute the proposition that the measure of the depreciation of currency is the measure of its redundancy. The depreciation does not depend upon that cause, but chiefly upon the fact that it cannot be used in the payment of the public debt, principal or interest, or in payment of duties.

I suppose it cannot be denied successfully that the measure of depreciation of currency is the measure of its redundancy when natural laws are left free to control it; but, as the Senator says, it cannot be used in payment of the public debt. Why is this? There are twelve hundred millions of the five-twenty bonds now in existence, which are by their terms payable at the option of the Government, and until republican legislation otherwise construed their meaning it was understood by the people that the principal was payable in legal-tenders. This legislation, upon the basis of the present premium, creates against the people an additional debt of over $150,000,000. But there are other artificial causes to which he fails to allude. The national banking laws drive over forty millions of the reserves to the redemption cities, by providing that certificates of redemption banks can be held to represent three-fifths of the reserves of the country banks, and certificates of the New York banks can be held to represent one-half of the reserves in the other redemption cities. It is centralized by operation of law; it can be put to no use, cannot be made available elsewhere. Not being called on by any legitimate demand of trade, it has sought stock-gambling, and is the creator of the wild speculation and recurring disasters that annually threaten our people and destroy our values.

The Comptroller of the Currency reports that at the commencement of the crisis the high rates that stock-gambling had created for money had drawn over sixty millions into the hands of the brokers from the country to the city of New York alone. Over forty millions more was in the other redemption cities, the most of which was, beyond question, absorbed by the same unhealthy influence.

Stock-gambling depends for existence on the distinction between gold and currency. It enables rings and combinations to inflate or contract values at will. The national banking system, by creating stock-gambling, is the cause of the depreciation of our currency; a signal proof of which is that when the national banks were broke and the stock boards closed, it appreciated to 6¼ per cent. discount, and when the banks resumed and the stock boards opened, it gradually assumed its old standard of depreciation.

The national banking system throws over one hundred millions of the money of the country districts to the stock board, the combined power of the whole of which was and is now used to perpetuate the distinction between gold and currency.

I voted but a few days since authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out what are falsely called reserves, $26,000,000 of which he paid without authority, for numerous reasons; one was that it did not result in adding additional annual burdens upon a people already sorely oppressed by protective legislation; another, that it to some extent robbed the advocates of national banks of a pretext for accomplishing their expansion; another, that it would save the people from the imposition of additional demands resulting from the extortion of the national banks; another, that it cripples the policy of the money centralizers, and threatens the lines of the advancing money despotism.

Were it not that stock gambling, created by the national banks and the national banker's policy of reserves falsely held out to the people as a sure protection of depositors, absorbed near two hundred millions of the circulation and withdrew it from all useful pursuits into channels destructive of every legitimate interest, my belief is that the currency would be amply sufficient for all the demands of trade. But so long as national bankers control the circulation and credits of the country it makes but little difference what the volume of circulation is, it will be drawn into the gambling vortex, rates of interest will be high, and all useful development retarded.

The Senator refers to the fact that our imports are vastly in excess of our exports, and in the course of his speech says:

> We have told the people of the South for years that they must accept the situation. Let us try to practice what we preach. We, too, must accept the situation.

Did the Senator consider that it might be thought that the severest trials the people of the South, as well as all the other agricultural districts, have had to contend with results from protective legislation since the war; that the effort to raise the laboring class of the South, that has embellished republican legislation since the war; that resolving all that class instantly from the condition of laborers into statesmanship; that the translation of a whole race from cotton producers to legislators, and the subordination of the experienced and the intelligent—in connection with the beauties of carpet-bag administration that their protective legislation begot, to which was superadded the beneficent influence of national bankers' administration of financial affairs—had anything to do with the condition of our export trade?

Is it not true that the chief southern products are always valuable for export? Is it not true that carpet-bag administration robbed the southern people of one hundred millions, and so mortgaged their energies and absorbed their capital that they are this day poorer than they were when peace was proclaimed at Appomattox? Is it not true that national banks are charging them from 15 to 25 per cent. per annum for the use of the national-bank circulation that a kind republican administration gives those bankers for nothing? Is it not true that near ten years have elapsed since the conclusion of the war, with unbridled control assumed by the republican party, that a large number of those States are in such unsettled condition, politically, that it is thought wise to introduce the beneficent influence of the bayonet to maintain the authority of the carpet-bagger? And is it not further true that development of vast resources of export wealth has been retarded, that the investment of capital has been prevented, by the madness and fanaticism and the selfish ambition that have sustained such a policy against a brave and a generous people?

Is it not true that their lands are worth less, and that their values have been decreasing ever since the conclusion of the war? Your policy has partially destroyed the resources of the South; has largely contributed to the excess of imports over exports, for the reason that instead of encouraging the production of the great export staple of the South it has robbed the producer. Instead of reconciling all classes to the new order of things it has divided those who to promote the general welfare should co-operate; has made an uneducated class, represented by reckless adventurers, the rulers, and attempted to reduce the organized intelligence of the South to serfdom. In the pretended interest of the colored race, but in the real interest of centralization and despotism, each session gives birth to projects to harass the southern people.

Mr. Speaker, before the accession of the republican party our people elected public servants who understood that encouragement of immigration was one of their highest duties; that the public wealth was increased by it; that it would result in more rapid development of our great resources. What has been the policy of the republican party in regard to the foreigner?

The Martin Koszta case under Mr. Marcy's administration of the State Department had settled the principle that after declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States the foreigner was entitled to the protection of the flag.

I have lately had shown me the instructions of the State Department under the republican administration of Mr. Fish, in which it is declared that no foreigner is entitled to a passport until he becomes naturalized. This decision I suppose was made upon the demand of the crowned heads of Europe, and the result is that republican rule denationalizes every man of foreign birth until he becomes a citizen. The Senator would do well to inform the German, and the Irish and all other nationalities who desire to share our heritage that they, too, "must accept the situation." It appears to me that a rightful inscription on their banners would be, protection of capital in manufactures and money, protection to the colored American citizen of African descent, and war on all the balance of peoples' industries and interests.

Having made a hasty investigation of the policies of the republican party, it will now be my effort to exhibit the remedy for their defects.

The letter of the Federal Constitution and the theory of our Government is that all officers of the national and State governments are the servants of the people. How far the theory and the law have been departed from it has been my effort to show.

Every right or responsibility not delegated by the Constitution is expressly reserved to the people and the States, and every encroachment on that principle is an aggression upon the people and war on our institutions. The whole theory of the Government rests on the proposition that the people are capable and have the right to govern themselves.

Assumption of paternalism in finance, relieving the people from responsibility, is dangerous in a twofold aspect: First, it tends to overthrow free institutions; second, it relieves the people from responsibility, and in so doing proportionately disqualifies them for control. The edicts of necessity are the authors of progress and the handmaidens of mental development. To make a people capable of governing, you must impose the responsibility of government on them. One of the profoundest errors that marks the course of republican party administration is that it is necessary to make laws establishing banks, and thereby consolidating the money interest. Money, independent of all laws for its organization, has inherent power of combination that is dangerous to the public welfare. The reason of this is obvious; it is the representative of value merely; by its constitution it antagonizes; is at war with labor, which is the real foundation upon which all values rest; its constant effort is to override and subject labor to its control. Every written law establishing money combinations adds to the inherent tendency it possesses to dominate the people. The war between capital and labor is a concomitant of all organized societies; and when capital gets the control flesh, blood, and brains are the victims. The most important of the many necessary reforms, therefore, is the total abolition of the so-called national banking system. It has none of the qualities of a pure and unselfish nationality; it is the organization of middle-men, who represent an infinitesimal fraction of our population, who through wealth which in the main has been accumulated by protective legislation, not subject to the control of the people, are made the recipients of bounty extorted from their earnings.

All laws that look to and encourage combinations of capital are laws in the interest of despotic control. Every expedient for its diffusion is in the interest of financial stability, results in a more equal distribution of our resources, more equally and more justly divides it among the people, and is a landmark of prosperity and liberty.

By the abolition of the national banks and the purchase of the five-twenty securities to an amount equal to the national-bank issue with greenbacks, the people will be saved 6 per cent. in gold annually on the amount of bonds deposited for security of their issue, resulting in the saving of the sum of twenty-odd million dollars gold each year. The money issued will go into the hands of the people; they will be remitted to the power that of right belongs to them to select their own financiers, in doing which the most conservative, economical, and upright will be made their depositories; the result of which will be that all the accumulated surplus will be devoted to legitimate pursuits and the healthy development of the locality in which it is produced. One of the glaring faults of national banking, to which I have not before adverted, is the absence of individual accountability to the people. The officers of the bank are the clerks of the directors, and the directors are the appointees of the stockholders; and when in the late crisis the banks broke, there was no one depositors could hold personally responsible. No such system without the indorsement of the Government could ever have secured the confidence of the people. The people, having too much faith in paternal control, abandoned the inquiry that belongs to their character when responsibility is imposed on them. If they expect to preserve intact their liberties, they must assume and demand control of their material interests.

Party spirit, forgetting the general welfare in devotion to men or factions, is one of the producing causes of that confidence in central infallibility that endangers the authority and the liberty of the people. The passions begotten by civil war are the most potent instrumentalities of bad men to breed those party hates and personal attachments and resentments that mislead the people and induce them to surrender their rightful authority. The greatest misfortune that can befall a free people is to submit their reason to the control of passion. The despotic monopolies against which throughout this whole country they are now organizing, result from the encroachment of their foes elevated to place by them when they had surrendered themselves to the dominion of passion. I believe in the people. Passion may for a while improperly sway their action, but civilization and freedom have been the result of their aggregate effort. They have been contending against combinations and rings, against despots and plunderers, ever since their dawn; and therefore I believe the only way to secure their moral, material, and mental advancement, is, as far as is consistent with safe organization, to submit everything to their control.

Burke, a very great man, in the zenith of his intelligence proclaimed a great truth when he said "the treasury was the state."

I propose to intrust the control of the money to the people. They will select in their neighborhoods and their counties the wisest, most conservative, and most responsible of their citizens for agents in its management. Economy and reform, legitimate business, and stable values will follow the instrumentalities that are now brought into play to create stock gambling, and all the direful influences that follow it will be swept out of existence.

The man, selected with wisdom by the people and responsible to them for the safe control of capital, will embark the money only in ligitimate pursuits. Instead of being an organization for the centralization of money, each agent so selected will be watchful of the condition of other agents; and those in control, instead of organizing raids on the producer, will be guardians for the people of financial security, and the credit and cash business of the people will be established on a safe, permanent, and free basis. The greenbacks issued from the Treasury will pay off a debt now annually costing the people over twenty millions in gold, will go to them independent of any central authority; diffusion of capital will take the place of centralization of capital, the monopolies will be dethroned, and the people will be reinstated.

Jackson, whose genius foreshadowed the ruin that would follow the centralized power of money, appealed to the people against its encroachments, and fought a gallant and successful battle. The people are rising in their might to burst its shackles. Many of their friends may fall by the wayside, but they will win the victory, and once more, and I hope permanently, we will commence our career in the interest of freedom. An overruling Providence has marked this country as the theater on which mankind shall demonstrate their equality of rights and their power of self-government.

Another remedy, demanded by every consideration of justice, against class distinctions, and therefore in the interest of and for the protection of liberty, is that such change be made in the Federal Constitution that values instead of representation be the basis of taxation.

The legislation of the republican party has imposed internal tax, directly or indirectly resulting in the absorption of the earnings of labor. For illustration let us take two articles, tobacco and whisky. The tax and licenses imposed on the raw material, leaf-tobacco, drives the producer from the market in the sale of leaf-tobacco by retail, and compels him to sell to capital, consolidated in tobacco manufactories, submits the value of the product, and therefore the value of the labor engaged in it, to their control; has decreased the volume of its production by the imposition of so heavy a tax that it drives our producers out of the fields of competition in sale abroad.

The imposition of tax on whisky is a tax on corn, and directly and indirectly subtracts from the value of labor; directly and indirectly decreases the value and general usefulness of the unparalleled expanse of fertile fields that are the people's inheritance.

The measure of the material condition of a people is the relation of their export and import trade. If the import trade exceeds the export trade the people are becoming impoverished; if the reverse is the rule, the exports exceed the imports, they are becoming rich. Under republican administration our imports have largely exceeded our exports; that is, although our producing capacity has been increased by an addition of over four millions of population during their retention of power the whole people are poorer than they were when these self-anointed apostles of equality took possession of the Government. By the imposition of tax on tobacco and tax on whisky, every dollar of which is wrung from the producer of tobacco and corn, they not only impose unequal tax to defray the public expenditures, but they prevent legitimate demand for the surplus and discourage their production.

In respect to the two articles named the people are unequally taxed by what may appropriately be termed the moral dodge of the financiers in power. No man more deeply deplores the frailty that results in excessive use of liquor, but the way to prevent it is by appealing to the sense, the pride, the moral characteristics of its victims. Laws regulating its sale as a beverage are doubtless to some extent reformatory, but it is demanded in the useful pursuits and will aways be manufactured and consumed. The cheaper it can be manufactured, the cheaper the articles of which it is a constituent can be sold to the people; the greater the number of consumers our corn-raisers can reach, the more valuable their products, and the greater the value of their lands.

Mr. Speaker, I hold it to be true that for the good of all classes property ought to defray public expenditure. I will go further, and say that in all well-organized societies it will pay them. What is the relation of capital in lands, stocks, or any of its multifarious representatives to labor? What value would capital in the hands of the rich possess if labor did not develop its fruitfulness? The holders of capital are the dependents of labor.

By the legislation of the republican party the land-holder and the mechanic, the merchant and the professions, and the laborer are the only classes who contribute to the maintenance of the Government, while the protected manufacturer and the money and bondholder are not only exempted from the burdens of government, but are made the recipients of exorbitant tributes from their rightful gains.

The effort of the republican party and the result of protection are that the whole burden of Government is collected without regard to property. All their legislation looks to imposition of taxes upon the people. A man may be worth $100,000 in property without an individual dependent on him, his neighbor, having a large family dependent on his daily labor for the necessaries of life; consumption of supplies being the measure of revenue recovery, the poor man pays more for public support than the rich one. He pays it in the shoes and the calicoes, the cotton and woolen goods, in the stoves and the kitchen utensils. He pays it out of his hard earnings whenever he purchases an article any of whose constituents are the subjects of protection. The revenues necessary to defray the expenses of our State governments are collected on property. Suppose the revenue system of the Government under republican legislation should be attempted in the States, is there a State in the Union the people of which would not rebel against it? Let me take the State of Illinois for example. If the people there could have the practical realization of the system—if the poor man with ten children, realizing that the revenues were measured by the consumption of necessaries and not by the value of property, and that he in maintaining his family was compelled to pay more than his millionaire neighbor whose property was protected by the laws—how long would that people, of which the poor man is the representative, stand the oppression which the system begets? They would not, nor either ought they to tolerate it. Protection is the expedient that capital uses to relieve property from taxation and imposes the burdens on the masses who are poor, by compelling them to pay the public revenues to secure the necessaries of life for their families and themselves.

Assuming it to be true that land would not be valuable without its development, and its development would not be possible without labor, the value of land must proceed from labor. The same rule is applicable to all the constituents of wealth. Labor being the foundation of wealth, the hardships you impose and the extortions you exact are directly or indirectly subtracted from the wealth of the people and from the value of the representatives of wealth.

The protective legislation of the republican party makes not only the land-holder, merchant, mechanic, and professional man pay more for the nocessities that civilization demands than free trade with direct taxation exacts, but in proportion to consumption its influence reaches the laborer, and makes higher wages necessary to maintain life. Although rates may be higher, the compensation is not adequate to their wants, for the reason that the values of their products are decreased, their employers and themselves being compelled to pay out of their rightful gains the extortions of class legislation and the additional burden imposed by the withdrawal of untold millions of money and bonds from public support. The farmers, many of whom have in the past been the most determined enemies of direct taxation, are by the manipulations of rings organized and made effective by republican legislation; and the laborer, the merchant, and the mechanic, who are their allies, are compelled to pay off the revenues, from payment of which centralized capital, in protected banks, manufactories, and railroads claim vested rights by virtue of legislative exemption and legislative protection.

The first decree of free trade and direct taxation, the Constitution being so changed as to make values instead of representation the basis, would be the abolition of the civil-service system and the custom-houses, and by their abolition the countless office-holder, who are the minions of power—an army in the interest of established authority—would be swept from existence, and the States, through their local officers, would collect the national revenues.

All history teaches us that the more distant and the less responsible public servants are to the people, the more corrupt and more despotic becomes the administration of public affairs. Under the influence of direct taxation and free trade the local collectors under the immediate eye of the people, subjected to their watchful supervision, would collect the revenue. It would be the business and interest of every citizen to see that officers were honest, and that faithfulness and economy should be the rule of public conduct. The national Government would, through their representative branch, make known their money necessities, and equalize the burdens between the States in proportion to their wealth.

The hope of protectionists is that direct taxation in its operation upon the land-holding class will be unpopular. So long as the stupidity of that class who, by protection, are robbed of dollars where cents would suffice under the equalizing influence of free trade and direct taxation justifies the hope, just so long will protected classes wield the lash over the people of this country. A fair estimate of the cost of protection to the people, basing the calculation on the consumption of protected articles the profits of which go into the pockets of a class and a section, will exhibit the fact that it costs the people fourfold the amount necessary to defray all public expenditures. The impoverishment of their country by protection ruinously reduces the value of their property, and the subsidies of protection that they imperceptibly expend largely exceeds the cost of direct taxation.

Mr. Speaker, one of the most serious misfortunes that has resulted from the war is the destruction of the trade relations that existed between the cereal-growing regions of the Northwest and the cotton regions of the South, and the highest duty of Congress is the adoption of some policy that will conduce to the re-establishment of those relations.

For the benefit of the whole country the energies of the people of the cotton States should be directed to and concentrated in its production. The step necessary to accomplish this great result is to place communication on such a footing that they can secure the cheap surplus, breadstuffs and meats, of the Northwest.

Independent of every benefit that would result to each of the sections named, independent of the vastly increased production of export wealth that would result from it, the gravest political considerations demand that the two peoples be tied together by cheap lines of transfer. Although I have never believed in the policy of internal improvement by the General Government, there can be no question that for the general welfare it is now imperatively necessary that the great rivers of the Northwest and South be improved and brought into communication by such means as will prevent the breaking of bulk in the transfer.

It is imperatively necessary that we also, through some proper artificial connection between the Ohio River and the navigable waters of the Atlantic, should forever put it out of the power of carrying interests to govern the values of the property of the people of the Mississippi Valley and the South. Improvement of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, improvement of the Tennessee, and its connection with the vast system of navigable rivers that traverse a large portion of the cotton-growing regions and empty into the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic Ocean, and the construction of canals to secure water communication from the Ohio to the Atlantic is demanded for the public safety, and by every consideration of sound policy.

Our carrying interests for shipment abroad are centralized in one locality. The public welfare demands that competing lines establishing communication with the ocean, at other and competing localities, should be encouraged.

I know little about engineering, but I am informed that these objects can be accomplished. When accomplished, you enfranchise a people who are now in bondage; you unite by the highest interests the diverse productions of the country; establish a home and always reliable demand for the surplus of the Northwest; and give renewed life to the development of our unparalleled resources for the production of cotton, the demand for which steadily increases with advancing civilization, enable us with ease to carry, and finally pay off, the immense burden that the unfortunate conflict between the sections created, and unite our whole people in bonds of interest and brotherhood that no sectional clamor can ever disturb.

It may be objected that large outlay is required to accomplish these objects. A superficial investigation has satisfied me that the highest estimate of the outlay is but small, when compared with the great benefits that would result from it. Not only would it create new home demands, but we would become successful competitors in sale of breadstuffs in Europe and throughout the world where demand exists.

Two contending ideas are presented to the people: one that they have not capacity to govern themselves wisely and therefore need masters; the other that public servants shall obey their behests and that their will secures wise administration of public affairs. It has been my attempt to prove that the first is represented by the republican party, that the second is the author of civilization, that progress and freedom are its results. The leaders of the republican party have exhibited their want of confidence in the people this session by using the morbid sentimentality of zealots to foist a so-called civil-rights bill on the country, the tendency of which is to centralize authority in the General Government and destroy the rightful power of the States and people. The colored people are already with the republican party, and their only possible object is through this legislation to establish precedent against freedom. They have further exhibited it by using a rightful demand of the people for cheap transportation to justify assumption of central authority over all carrying interests which from every consideration of sound policy should be under the control of the people in the States.

The two paths and their end and results are apparent to the most common understanding. Party republicanism is the embodiment of the despotic idea of government; real republicanism as inculcated by our fathers and ingrafted in the fundamental law; is the idealization of progress, the law of advancing civilization, and the monumentalizing of those principles that have been forged for mankind by countless battles, and by the brains of intellectual and humanitarian Titans whose names have emblazoned the history of Christian civilization for the past five hundred years. In conclusion I desire to say that if republican legislation had not created an unnatural financial condition, I should now be for hard money, believing as I do that we should be confined to the express stipulation of the Constitution, and that all credit contrivances different from the money standard of the world are in the interest of plunder. Unwise legislation has, however, in my judgment, made it necessary that we should gradually dismantle the strongholds built against the people, lest in their immediate overthrow all might be involved in ruin. Policy and principle are allies. Sound policy is the highway by which principle is applied. As illustrated by republican rule, it looks to the sustenance of money-changers, to the protection of monopolies, and to the organizing of rings. As taught, practiced, and believed in by the democratic party, sound policy is the elevation and equality of the people.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of the present session I introduced a bill directing the Attorney-General to institute and prosecute suits against the several Pacific Railroads for the collection of interest due the Government on bonds issued to aid in the construction of the several Pacific roads, and also resolutions asking that a special committee be appointed to investigate the management and affairs of the Central Pacific Railroad and its Credit Mobilier or Contract Finance Company. The bill and resolutions were referred to committees; and since that time I have endeavored by every means possible to obtain a report, and have in two instances argued the necessity for such an investigation before a committee of this House.

I merely mention this for the reason that when the Credit Mobilier investigation was ordered in the Forty-second Congress no preliminary arguments were necessary, the mover of the resolution having simply introduced the same, and by a vote of the House the investigation was ordered to be made.

By referring to the House Journal of January 6, 1873, I find that, on motion of Hon. JEREMIAH M. WILSON, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, and such committee be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire whether or not any person connected with the organization or association commonly known as the Credit Mobilier, now holds any of the bonds of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, for the payment of which or the interest thereon the United States is in any way liable; and whether or not such holders, if any, or their assignees, of such bonds, are holders in good faith and for value or procured the same illegally or by fraud; and whether or not the United States may properly refuse to pay interest thereon or the principal thereof when the same shall become due; and whether or not any relinquishment of first mortgage lien that may have heretofore been made by the United States with reference to the bonds of said railroad company may be set aside; and to inquire into the character and purpose of such organization, and what officers of the United States or members of Congress have at any time been connected therewith; what connection it had with the contracts for the construction of said Union Pacific Railroad Company, and to report the facts to this House, together with such bill as may be necessary to protect the interests of the United States on account of any of the bonds of the class hereinbefore referred to; and said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time.

And the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof.) So the rules were suspended and the resolution agreed to.

In accordance with this resolution Hon. JEREMIAH M. WILSON of Indiana, Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR of Massachusetts, Hon. THOMAS SWANN, Hon. Henry W. Slocum, and Hon. Samuel Shellabarger were appointed a special committee, and immediately proceeded to investigate in accordance with the resolution adopted.

In the same connection I desire to call your attention to the following resolution, offered by Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL on the 24th of January, 1873, and which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the committee heretofore appointed by this House, of which Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, is chairman, be authorized to extend their present investigation so as to include the Central Pacific Railroad Company and its branches, with like power and for like purposes as originally given to said committee in reference to the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

The committee, in accordance with the resolution of Mr. RANDALL, partly investigated the affairs of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, as will be seen by their report of March 1, 1873, which I now read:

The special committee who were directed by resolution of the House of Representatives of January 24, 1873, "to extend their present investigation so as to include the Central Pacific Railroad Company and its branches, with like power and for like purposes as originally given to said committee in reference to the Union Pacific Railroad Company," respectfully report:

The records, documents, contracts, and books of account of the Central Pacific Railroad, including those that relate to its original construction, are at Sacramento, in the State of California. Most of its officers reside in California, as do most of the persons who were concerned in the construction of the road. If the committee had caused a subpœna to be sent for these persons, so far as their names could be seasonably ascertained here, the witnesses would not have arrived before February 13. It would undoubtedly have been essential to a complete investigation to send for other witnesses again to California, so that it would have been impossible to obtain all needful documents and witnesses during the present session. Besides, the time of the committee has been occupied constantly until Thursday, February 20, with other investigations, some of which are not yet completed.

It has been therefore manifestly impossible that your committee could during the present term make such inquiry into the matters submitted as should do justice either to the public or the corporation. We have therefore confined ourselves to inquiry whether there is probable cause for such an investigation and to determine a plan for conducting it.

The committee have examined as witnesses Charles P. Huntington, vice-president of the railroad, and Richard Franchot, whose duties to the corporation are defined by himself as "watching over the interest of the Central Pacific Railroad Company at Washington and other places, subject to the call of the president of the company." Mr. Franchot's relation to the company and to Congress may be conjectured from the following portion of his testimony, which can be found with the evidence taken concerning the Union Pacific Railroad Company, pages 688–690:

"Question. You have a general knowledge I suppose of the history of that road since 1866?

"Answer. I cannot say that I have.

"Q. What are your duties in relation to it?

"A. I take charge of its business at Washington and other places in the interim of the sessions of Congress. I am subject to the call of the vice-president.

"Q. What is the interest of the company at Washington?

"A. Nothing more nor less than the general interests of the railroad. We have to watch our interests here.

"Q. What are they?

"A. There are frequently questions coming up in Congress relating to the interests of the Central Pacific Railroad.

"Q. Then you mean that you are an agent to watch the passage of bills through Congress which might affect the interests of the company?

"A. That is so, in part.

"Q. What other agency for the company have you in Washington

"A. Not any. I am subject to the call of Mr. Huntington.

"Q. Are you a regular salaried officer of the road?

"A. Yes.

"Q. What is your salary?

"A. My salary is $20,000 a year.

"Q. And do you spend substantially your whole time here when Congress is in session?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Are there any other agents of the company here while Congress is in session?

"A. Not that I am aware of.

"Q. Or officers of the road?

"A. Not that I am aware of.

"Q. At what other points besides Washington are you called upon to discharge duties in connection with your company?

"A. At no particular point. When any business occurs in the interim of the session of Congress, I am liable to be called upon to attend to it.

Q. "What kind of business is it you are called upon to attend to in the interim of Congress?

"A. I cannot say; if anything occurs where I can be useful to the company, I am liable to be called upon to attend to it.

"Q. Have you at any time been called away to look after business of the company?

"A. I do not recollect now; I have, however.

"Q. To what points have you been called?

"A. I cannot say now; I have no distinct recollection of any specific thing.

"Q. Have you been called, at any time, away from Washington to look after any specific business?

"A. No, sir; not from the city of Washington.

"Q. The business which you have been called upon to discharge, by virtue of your agency, has been at the city of Washington?

"A. Yes.

"Q. You have no recollection of being called upon to look after the interest of the company at any other point?

"A. No specific business; I cannot bring any to mind; I may have been away twenty times, but I cannot recollect now.

"Q. If there had been any business of any considerable importance that you had been called upon to attend you would recollect it, I suppose?

"A. Yes, sir."

Mr. Huntington testified as follows:

"Question. I understood you to say that there has as yet been no dividend paid by the Central Pacific Railroad Company to its stockholders?

"Answer. That is the answer I gave.

"Q. Is it not your belief that the persons who have been prominent in the management of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, including yourself, received considerable values either in moneys, bonds, or stock, as profits on contracts made for its construction?

"A. I do not think we have made as much as we would have made if we had not gone into the road.

"Q. I ask you if it is not your belief that persons active in the management of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, including yourself, received considerable values (I do not ask whether they were reasonable or unreasonable) as profits on contracts for its construction?

"A. I think we have. I think I have an interest in a contract of the Contract and Financial Company, and I think I have made some money.

"Q. Do you mean to have me understand, by the mode in which you answer that question, that any doubt exists in the mind of yourself that you have received yourself, while an officer of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, considerable values, either in money, bonds, or stocks, as profits upon contracts made for its construction?

"A. I think I have. I have received no money.

"Q. The question I now put to you is, whether you mean the committee to understand from the way in which you make that answer that you have any doubt on that subject in your mind?

"A. I am not so clear as I would like to be.

"Q. Be good enough to attend to my question. Have you any doubt in your mind that you have received considerable values, while a stockholder and officer of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, as profits on contracts made for its construction?

"A. If I have received them at all it is as a stockholder in the Contract and Finance Company.

"Q. I do not care whether you have received them as your share of the profits made by a company of which you were a member, but simply whether you have received as profits on contracts made for its construction considerable values?

"A. I think I have.

"Q. Have you any doubts of it?

"A. I have doubts about the course, but I presume I have some paper stock. If there have been any profits made by my partner I have got some of them.

"Mr. HOAR. I am going to put that question once more, and to ask you to give a frank answer to it.

"The WITNESS. I will endeavor to do so.

"Q. Have you any doubt that you have received, while an officer of this Central Pacific Railroad Company, considerable values as profits on contracts made for its construction, either in stocks, bonds, or otherwise?

"A. The only question in my mind is whether I received any considerable value. I would say that I have received, no doubt, some value. The "considerable" I would not want to say.

"Q. Is not the nominal value of the stock which you and your firm have received as profits on such contracts more than a million dollars?

"A. No; I do not think I have received a million dollars, or anything like that, in money's worth.

"Q. I ask you if the nominal value of the stock is not more than a million dollars?

"A. I should think something thereabout. Without saying positively, I should think something approximating thereto.

"Q. In stock of the Central Pacific Railroad Company?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Have you not also received considerable values in bonds or other obligations to pay money, as such profits?

"A. I have received some; I do not know what.

"Q. I am inquiring simply as to your belief as to what you or your firm have received as your share of profits on contracts for the construction of this railroad. Now I ask you if it is not your belief that your firm have received in the shape of bonds, or other obligations to pay money, considerable values as your share of such profits?

"A. My impression is that we have received some values.

"Q. In bonds?

"A. Yes; some value.

"Q. Is not that value in bonds which you have received more than $100,000, according to your belief?

"A. I should think very likely it would be. I should like to ask Mr. Hopkins, if he were here.

"Q. So should I. It is not, according to your belief, more than $500,000 which you have received in bonds?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Give us your best judgment of the amount which you have received in bonds—yourself and your partner.

"A. I would like to answer that just as it is, but I have not the data, really, to give an intelligent answer to it. What is the question?

"Q. I ask you to state, according to your best judgment, the values which your firm has received in bonds as your share of the profits from the contracts for the construction of the Central Pacific Railroad while you were an officer?

"A. I really have not the data to give an intelligent answer. I said a hundred thousand dollars, because I think it ought to be more than that.

"Q. You have said that, in your judgment, it was more than $100,000 and less than $500,000. Can you state it any more nearly than that—somewhere between one and five hundred thousand dollars?

"A. No; I do not know that I would want to.

"Q. Is it not your belief that the practical control of the Contract and Finance Company which constructed this railroad, and the practical control of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, for which it was constructed, was at the time of the contract for its construction, and during the execution of that contract, in the same persons?

"A. It is my impression.

"Q. I do not know what precise meaning you give to the word "impression." I ask your belief.

"A. It conveys the same idea, I suppose.

"Q. The question is whether it is or not your belief that the practical control of the Contract and Finance Company and of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, at the time of the making of the contract for the construction of the road, and during its execution, was in the same parties?

"A. My impression is that it was. I should like to say that I spoke to a good many people to go into that road, and almost every person refused to do so; and we had great trouble in getting people."

It would seem from this testimony of Mr. Huntington that there is probable cause for believing that the capital of the Central Pacific Railroad Company does not represent cash, but profits on construction, and that the property of the road has passed largely into the hands of its own officers who have made contracts in its name with themselves. Whether these contracts have been lawful and justifiable it would be unjust to the parties to express an opinion here. We think they afford good reason for further inquiry.

It also appears that there is no exact statement of the real cost of the work. It is important that such a statement should now be so made as to bind both parties and preserved with reference to the right of Congress to legislate to fix fares when the net earnings amount to 10 per cent. of the cost.

The case of the Central Pacific Railroad Company differs from that of the Union Pacific Railroad Company in the essential particular that the former was created by the State of California and the latter by act of Congress. Congress has no concern with any alleged disobedience by the Central Pacific Railroad of the requirements of the act incorporating it, unless such disobedience constitutes a breach of the conditions on which the corporation accepted the grants from the Government. But Congress is concerned—

First. To see that its bounty has not been misapplied.

Second. To fix the true cost of the road.

Third. To see whether the provision of the statute of 1864, section 15, has been observed—

That the several companies authorized to construct the aforesaid roads are hereby required to operate and use said roads and telegraph for all purposes of communication, travel, and transportation, as far as the public and the Government are concerned, as one continuous line, and in such operation and use to afford and secure to each equal advantages and facilities as to rates, time, and transportation, without any discrimination of any kind in favor of the road or business of any or either of said companies, or adverse to the road or business of any or either of the others.

The select committee were evidently impressed with the belief that the evidence therein taken was of sufficient moment to warrant them in saying in relation to the contracts that "We think they afford good reason for further inquiry;" and in language which implies at least a doubt as to the cost of the construction of the road the committee further state, "That it is important that an exact statement of the cost of the road should be made."

Then denoting the difference between the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific—the one being created by the State of California and the other by Congress—the committee further add that Congress has no concern with any alleged disobedience by the Central Pacific of the requirements of the act incorporating it, unless such disobedience constitutes a breach of the condition on which the corporation accepted the grants from the Government. But Congress is concerned—

First. To see that the bounty has not been misapplied.

Second. To fix the true cost of the road.

And to these two provisions I desire to call the attention of this House to-night.

The report which I have just read comes from a committee, three of whom are members of this Congress; men in whom the people of the whole country repose confidence for their integrity, honor, and justice.

It shows from the testimony taken that the Central Pacific road employs annually an agent or lobbyist, whose duties are to watch oevr the interests of the Central Pacific Railroad Company during the sessions of Congress, and who for his diligent services receives a salary of $20,000 per annum. For this magnificent sum he is sent here to oppose all investigations asked for by the people in the name of the Government; to oppose all honest endeavors to ascertain the true status of this soulless corporation; to represent and defend oppression, wrong, and injustice, not only to the honest stockholders of the road, but to the Government, which aided in its construction. This is this man's duties, for which he receives $20,000 a year, while the company is too poor to pay a dividend to men and women who invested in the stock of the road or a cent of interest to the Government.

The same testimony shows that its vice-president has in the course of his varied life thoroughly mastered the art of "dodging a question," and within the last two weeks I have had occasion to know that he is not only a master but also a professor of that art.

Read his testimony carefully, and you will find that to no question did he give a direct answer. He is "under the impression" is almost every answer given. There is nothing positive, nothing by which he would commit himself. Every answer he made before that committee showed upon its face the dread he had of an investigation, and every action of his in opposition to my resolution shows that he and the men associated with him in the Central Pacific dread the avalanche which is slowly but surely sweeping them to destruction.

In the resolution which I have introduced asking for an investigation of this company, I have been prompted solely from a desire to represent the wishes of my constituents, who are thoroughly conversant with the frauds committed by this corporation, and to perform an honest conviction of duty I owe both to them and my country; to respond to a solemn oath which I registered on taking my seat as a Representative to protect the best interests of my Government and the welfare and prosperity of the people of our common country.

I am in favor of these Pacific Railroads; I am in favor of any enterprise that develops the resources of our nation; but I want these corporations to respect the wishes of the people, to pay their honest debts, to oppress no man, and to deal justly with the Government and the people.

With these ends in view, on the 12th day of last January I presented the resolution to which I have referred, and which I will now read:

Whereas the Central Pacific Railroad Company was incorporated by the State of California on the 27th day of June, A. D. 1861, to construct a railroad to the eastern boundary of said State; and whereas by acts of Congress of the years 1862 and 1863 said company was authorized to extend said railroad eastward through the territory of the United States, by an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean," and received from the United States, under said act and the acts supplemental thereto and amendatory thereof, and from the State of California, and counties and corporations within said State, from the State of Nevada, and from the Territory of Utah, the following amounts, estimated in gold coin, to wit:

Land granted by the United States of the value, in gold coin, of...	$50,288,000 00
Granted and donated by various corporations within the State of California	5,000,000 00
Gratned and donated by various corporations and individuals situate within the State of Nevada	3,000,000 00
Granted and donated by various corporations and individuals within the Territory of Utah	1,500,000 00
Donated by the State of California	1,500,000 00
Bonds on which the State of California guarantees and pays the interest	12,000,000 00
Donated by the county of Placer, in the State of California, bonds..	250,000 00
Donated by the city and county of San Francisco, interest bonds...	400,000 00
Donated by the city and county of Sacramento, interest bond	300,000 00
Bonds by the United States Government	27,389,120 00
First-mortgage bonds of the Central Pacific Railroad Company.....	$27,389,120 00
Second-mortgage bonds of said Central Pacific Railroad Company, legalized by law	15,601,741 83
Second-mortgage bonds issued and sold as above	11,787,378 17

And whereas the directors of said Central Pacific Railroad Company made contracts with certain of their own members to construct said road, known as the "Contract and Finance Company," for consideration in lands, money, and bonds, far in excess of the actual cost of construction; and whereas said Central Pacific Railroad is, and has been, completed and in running order for—in part and in whole—over six years last past, and the profits accruing from the same, amounting to over $30,000,000 per annum, have been kept and appropriated to their own use, in violation of their duties, and in fraud of the United States Government; and whereas said directors of the said Central Pacific Railroad Company issued to themselves, and for their personal profit and benefit, the second-mortgage bonds of said Central Pacific Railroad Company to the amount of $27,387,120, payable in United States gold coin, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum, and have with said profits accruing to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, from the sales of United States bonds, lands, and other subsidies as aforesaid mentioned, and the issue to themselves of the bonds aforesaid, bought in order to defraud the Government of the United States out of the interest now due from said Central Pacific Railroad Company, other railroads in the State of California, and expended in doing the same all of the accruing profits of said Central Pacific Railroad for the benefit of the directors, failing and fraudulently refusing to pay the Government of the United States the interest legally due on said second-mortgage bonds: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a select committee of seven members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, and such committee be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire whether or not any person connected with the organization or association commonly known as the "Contract and Finance Company" of the Central Pacific Railroad Company now holds any of the bonds, lands, or other subsidies granted said company, for the payment of which, or the interest thereon, the United States is in any way liable; and whether or not such holders, if any, or their assignees, of such bonds, lands, or other subsidies, are holders in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, or procured the same illegally or by fraud; and whether or not the United States may properly refuse to pay interest thereon, or the principal thereof, when the same shall become due; and whether or not any relinquishment of the first-mortgage lien that may have heretofore been made by the United States, with reference to the bonds of said Central Pacific Railroad Company, or any other branch roads connected therewith, may be set aside; and to inquire into the character and purpose of such organization, and fully of all the transactions of said Central Pacific Railroad Company, and of all transactions had and contracted by and between the directors of the Central Pacific Railroad Company and Charles Crocker & Co.; and of all transactions and contracts made by said directors with the "Contract and Finance Company" for the furnishing of material of every kind and character whatsoever, and the construction of the Central Pacific Railroad and other branch roads connected therewith, and of all contracts made by said directors of the Central Pacific Railroad Company with Wells, Fargo & Co., or any other corporation or corporations, individual or individuals, for material furnished, or for the construction of said Central Pacific Railroad, or other railroads constructed or purchased by said directors, and what officers of the United States, or members of Congress, if any, have at any time been connected therewith; and to report the facts to this House, together with such bill as may be necessary to protect the interest of the United States Government and the people, on account of any of the bonds, lands, and subsidies of the class hereinbefore referred to, and against the combinations to defraud the Government and the people; and said committee is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time.

In preparing the resolutions I have just read I was governed by a statement of facts as sworn to by the Hon. Samuel Brannan, in a suit which he instituted against the directors and stockholders of the Central Pacific Railroad, a copy of which is now in the hands of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad; also the affidavits of Hon. James R. Rogers, of Placer County, California, and the concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of my State. Within the last few weeks I have also received a letter from a gentleman who formerly occupied a prominent subordinate position in connection with the Central Pacific, and who is thoroughly acquainted with the manner of constructing that road.

It has been contended by the managers of the Contract Finance Company that in no case were sub-contracts made, yet this gentleman offers to prove before an investigating committee the fact that sub-contracts were made, and to show the difference between the amount paid these sub-contractors and the amount charged by the gentleman who directed the affairs of the Contract Finance Company, and I have no doubt, if an investigation was ordered, the Central Pacific Railroad would far outvie in rascality the Credit Mobilier investigation, which I have several times referred to in the course of my remarks.

In asking for this investigation, I have also been sustained by nine-tenths of the leading newspapers upon the Pacific coast. I propose to-night to give a fair and impartial review of the affairs of the Central Pacific Railroad Company and its protégé known as the Contract Finance Company. I have therefore carefully compiled from the reports of various railroad companies in the United States a statement showing the cost of construction, stock, and equipment, including the building of depots and other actual expenses, and ask that the members of this House may carefully compare the same with the reported cost of constructing the Central Pacific Railroad.

For instance, roads in Massachusetts cost as follows:

Athol and Enfield Railroad $27,600 per mile, and passes over a very uneven country; Boston and Albany Railroad $48,500 per mile, (work heavy and passes over a very uneven country;) Boston, Barrere and Garden Railroad $23,380.35 per mile. (See American Railroad Manual, pages 25, 26, and Poor's Railroad Manual.)

Connecticut.—Sanbury and Norwalk Railroad $37,000 per mile; New Haven, New London and Stonington Railroad $24,000 per mile; Shepang Valley Railroad $32,150 per mile; New York, Providence and Boston Railroad $49,000 per mile. (See American Railroad Manual, pages 72, 76, 78, 79)

Vermont.—Connecticut and Pasumpsic Railroad $28,127 per mile; and passes through a mountainous country. (Ibidem, page 85.)

New York.—Albany and Susquehanna Railroad $52,623 per mile, and passes through a very rough country, as shown by engineer's report. Carthage, Watertown and Sacket's Harbor Railroad $31,174.72 per mile. The Erie Railroad cost $59,460 per mile. This includes the expense of erecting heavy iron and stone bridges, and other improvements, second to no other road in the country. The Ithaca and Athens Railroad cost $34,435 per mile; Long Island Railroad cost $28,341.20 per mile; New York and Harlem Railroad cost $60,373 per mile, a considerable part of which is double track. New York and Oswego Midland Railroad cost $40,000 per mile. This includes a very large outlay of money for valuable property and improvements. New York, Kingston and Syracuse Railroad cost $43,278.95 per mile. New York Central and Hudson River Railroad cost $44,845 per mile. This cost per mile includes an outlay of $3,853,045 for real estate and valuable improvements in the cities of Albany and Buffalo. The Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad cost $41,378 per mile, a great part of which is double track; Utica and Black River Railroad cost $28,266 per mile. (See American Railroad Manual, pages 90, 98, 105, 121, 123, 128, 130, 133, 135, and 145.)

Pennsylvania.—Alleghany Valley Railroad cost $27,436 per mile. (Ibidem, page 189.)

Maryland.—Baltimore and Potomac Railroad cost $53,075 per mile, including double tracks. (Ibidem, page 281.)

South Carolina.—Cheraw and Darlington Railroad cost $17,000 per mile. (Ibidem, page 325.)

Georgia.—Georgia and Banking Railroad cost $18,000 per mile; Atlantic and Gulf Railroad cost $23,425 per mile. (Ibidem, pages 334, 338.)

Alabama.—Nashville and Decatur Railroad cost $32,212 per mile. (Ibidem, page 355.)

Indiana.—Terre Haute and Indianapolis Railroad cost $35,091.40 per mile. (Ibidem, page 457.)

Illinois.—Chicago and Alton Railroad cost $46,640 per mile. This includes immense improvements, costly bridges, &c. Illinois Central Railroad cost $48,055.26 per mile. Springfield and Illinois Southeastern Railroad cost $35,857 per mile. Western Union Railroad cost $38,459.85 per mile. This includes sidings and improvements. (Ibidem, pages 463, 478, 494, 496.)

Missouri.—Rockford, Rock Island and Saint Louis Railroad $52,380 per mile; Kansas City, Saint Joseph and Council Bluffs Railroad cost $34,311 per mile; Saint Louis and Saint Joseph Railroad cost $35,000 per mile. (Ibidem, pages 505, 511.)

Kansas.—Kansas Central Railroad (narrow gauge) cost $14,820 per mile; Kansas Pacific, $52,278 per mile; Lawrence and Southwestern, $35,750 per mile. (Ibidem, pages 514–516.)

Iowa.—Burlington and Missouri Railroad cost $45,780 per mile. (Ibidem, page 521.)

Colorado.—Colorado Central Railroad $40,000 per mile. (Ibidem, page 542.)

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, with its immense bridges, tunnels, &c.; with the grades (the heaviest of any road in the United States) averaging about 40 feet to the mile for nearly 200 miles and 116 feet to the mile for 17 miles, its curves not less than from 400 to 1,000 feet radius, and its tunnels 12,804 feet, averaged not quite $40,000 to the mile, as shown by the engineer's reports. (American Railroad Manual, page 285.) A comparison of the above reports will show that the items enumerated include the cost of stone and timber for building the roads, the purchase of right of way, of depot grounds, side-tracks, and everything necessary to stock and equip these roads, all of which were granted to the Central Pacific and other Pacific Railroad Companies free of charge.

Having thus briefly shown the cost of constructing some of the largest and most important railroads in the United States, as shown by the reports of the officers and engineers of said roads, I shall now endeavor to show the cost of building the Central Pacific, and the enormous subsidies received from the general and State governments, and leave for the consideration of this Congress whether or not there is a necessity for an investigation of the gigantic frauds committed by the directors of the Contract Finance Company of the Central Pacific Railroad, whereby the Government and people and honest stockholders have been defrauded of millions of dollars, which have been received and earned by the said company and divided among its directors and a favored few.

THE COST OF THE ROAD.

To ascertain the cost of the Pacific roads, and especially the Central Pacific, let us examine the topography of the country and the grades over which the roads pass, as shown by the engineer's reports. From Omaha to Cheyenne, on the Union Pacific, the grade is 5,051 feet in 517 miles, or 10 feet to the mile. Omaha is 968 feet above the sea; Cheyenne, 6,019 feet. From Cheyenne to the summit of the Rocky Mountains the ascent is 2,223 feet in about 32 miles. The elevation of the summit is 6,242 feet above sea-level. After the summit is passed the road traverses about 400 miles on an elevated table land, to the Wasatch range of mountains. The elevation of this range at the point crossed is 7,550 feet above the sea and 3,550 above Salt Lake, which has an elevation of 4,200 feet above the sea.

The highest point between Salt Lake and the sink of the Humboldt River is 6,200 feet. From Salt Lake to the base of the Sierra Nevada Mountains is 420 miles, 300 of which is along the valley of the Humboldt River. The Central Pacific road crosses the summit of the Sierra Nevada 7,042 feet above tide-water. The heaviest grade is 116 feet to the mile, for 3½ miles, while the heaviest grade on the Baltimore and Ohio Road is 116 feet for 17 miles. By the act of July 1, 1862, closing paragraph of section 12, it is expressly enacted that "the grades and curves (of the Pacific roads) shall not exceed the maximum grades and curves of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The eastern base of the Sierra Nevada is 3,932 feet above the sea.

The engineer further adds that in crossing the Sierra Nevada "a route was found open which the ascent has been nearly uniformly distributed." For instance, a part of the road from Truckee averages about 30 feet to the mile. (See Poor's Railroad Manual.)

The report further states that the elevation of this vast plain from which the Rocky Mountains rise, although so great, yet these mountains when they are reached present no obstacles more formidable than those offered by the Alleghany range to several lines of railroads which cross them. On the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad the mountains are crossed at an elevation of about 2,600 feet above the sea and with long grades of 116 feet to the mile. The line of the railroad up the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains is not so difficult as those upon which several great works have been constructed in the Eastern States. (See engineer's report, Poor's Railroad Manual.)

Again the report states "that in crossing the Sierra Nevadas at an elevation of 7,042 feet in a distance of 105 miles, the company followed the ridges or divides." Upon these a favorable line was found involving no grade of over 116 feet to the mile, and this for only the short distance of 3½ miles. The elevation on the California road (meaning the Central Pacific Railroad) is surmounted by a line of nearly uniform grade, averaging from 75 to 105 feet to the mile. The route for the eastern portion of the line is up the valley of the Platte, which has a course nearly due east from the base of the mountains. Till these are reached this valley presents probably the finest line ever adopted for such a work for an equal distance. It is not only straight, but its slope is very nearly uniform toward the Missouri, at a rate of about 10 feet to the mile. The soil on the greater part of the line forms an admirable road-bed. The river, after leaving the mountains, has very few affluents, the only constructed bridges for the distance being one over the Loup Fork and the North Platte. (See engineer's report in reference to road-bed.)

The base of the mountains is assumed to be at Cheyenne, 517 miles from the Missouri River. This park is elevated 6,032 feet above the sea, and 5,095 feet above Omaha. From Cheyenne to the summit of the mountains, which is elevated 8,242 feet above the sea, the distance is 32 miles. The grades for reaching the summit do not exceed 80 feet to the mile.

After crossing the eastern crest of the mountains the line traverses an elevated table land for about 400 miles to the western crest of the mountains, which forms the eastern rim of the Salt Lake Basin, and which has an elevation of 7,550 feet above the sea. Upon this elevated table is a succession of extensive plains, which present great facilities for the construction of the road.

The whole line is a favorable one when its great length is considered. More than one-half of it is practically level, while the mountain ranges are surmounted by grades not in any case exceeding those now worked upon some of our most successful roads. (See engineer's report, Poor's Railroad Manual, and American Railroad Manual.)

From the above statements and extracts it will be seen at a glance that the grades upon the Pacific roads are not so great as upon many in other sections of the country; consequently there could not have been so much labor involved in their construction, nor could they have cost so much as roads in the Eastern States. The estimated average cost is $44,000 per mile in the United States for thoroughly constructing and equipping railroads, (see Poor's Railroad Manual, 1869–'70, page 28, and 1870–'71, page 42,) while the directors of the Central Pacific road claim that it cost for the construction of their road from one hundred and eleven to one hundred and thirteen thousand dollars per mile.

That such was not the case I will now proceed to prove from facts in my possession.

In the first place, permit me to call your attention for a few moments to the cost of construction of the Union Pacific Railroad, under the management of the company known as the Credit Mobilier.

The Credit Mobilier Company report the cost of construction at $68,058 per mile; 186 miles at $90,000 per mile. Total, 1,100 miles. Total cost, $78,945,012.

Cash resources, United States bonds	$29,328,000
First-mortgage bonds	29,328,090
Capital stock paid on work done	8,500,000
Land grant, 1,408,000 acres, at $1.50	21,120,000
Total	88,276,000

It will be seen from the above statement that the resources, consisting of subsidies, land grants, &c., from the national Government were $9,330,988 more than sufficient to pay the cost of construction, as shown by their own statement.

But now for the facts, as shown by the evidence before the Union Pacific Railroad Committee, found in the Congressional Globe, volume 94, pages 110, 111:

Your committee present the following summary of the cost of this road to the railroad company and to the contractors, as appears by the books:

COST TO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Hoxie contract		$12,974,416 24
Ames contract		57,140,102 94
Davis contract		23,431,768 10
		93,546,287 28

COST TO CONTRACTORS.

Hoxie contract	$7,806,183 33
Ames contract	27,285,141 99
Davis contract	15,629,633 62
		50,720,958 94
Total		42,825,328 34
To this should be added amount paid Credit Mobilier on account of 58 miles		1,104,000 00
Total profit on construction		43,925,328 34

It appears, then, speaking in round numbers, that the actual cost of the road was $50,000,000, which cost was wholly reimbursed from the proceeds of the Government bonds and first-mortgage bonds; and that from the stock, the income bonds, and land grant bonds the builders received in cash value at least $23,000,000 as profit, being a percentage of about 48 per cent. on the entire cost.

It thus appears from the evidence that the Credit Mobilier Company of the Union Pacific defrauded the Government out of $43,925,328. What was this Credit Mobilier Company? Simply an organization composed of the directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, organized for the purpose of subletting contracts among themselves, and thereby defrauding the Government of millions of dollars. They transacted their business in the same room with the directors of the Union Pacific Company, and together formed one of the most stupendous combinations that has ever been formed to swindle a government and people.

How singular the coincidence. The Contract Finance Company of the Central Pacific meet in the same room with the Central Pacific Railroad directors; they sublet contracts among themselves, and together they form a combination before which the fraud and rascality of the Credit Mobilier sink into insignificance. In other words, the men composing the Contract Finance Company and the directors of the Central Pacific Railroad Company are one and the same persons. This has been admitted in the evidence of Mr. Huntington, the vice-president of the road, in his examination before the special committee of the Forty-second Congress.

Mr. Brannan, one of the stockholders of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and a man of unimpeachable integrity, a sterling citizen, and one who has done much to develop the industries of California, testifies as follows:

The plaintiff is informed and believes, and therefore avers, upon and according to his information and belief, that the first 7.18 miles of said railroad and telegraph line, from Sacramento eastwardly, was actually constructed for little less than $11,500 per mile. That the actual cost of the next succeeding 150 miles, eastwardly, was less than $42,000 per mile, and no greater sum was expended in the construction thereof. That the actual cost of the construction of the rest of said road and telegraph line, to wit, for a distance of 620.32 miles, was less than $21,000 per mile, which said cost for each distance included depots, switches, turn-tables, side-tracks, water-tanks and water-stations, platforms, warehouses, repair-shops, machine-shops, and engine-houses, and all other equipments and furniture of said road.

Mr. Brannan makes this statement under oath, and after a careful and thorough investigation of the entire subject. He further swears so far as he was able, the books being concealed from him—

That instead of undertaking, by its own officers and agents, the construction of its railroad and telegraph line and the furnishing and equipping thereof, or making a reasonable contract with disinterested persons therefor, or letting out the work and the furnishing of materials for the construction, furnishing, and equipping thereof to the lowest bidder, and instead of endeavoring to construct, furnish, and equip the same in the most economical manner, the said Leland Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, Charles and E. B. Crocker, and their confederates, then composing a majority of the directors of the said Central Pacific, combining and confederating together in order to defraud the said Central Pacific and the plaintiff and other stockholders thereof, and to secure to themselves, jointly and severally, personally great profits, advantages, and gains, entered into an arrangement between themselves, under the name or C. Crocker & Co., and under that name, from the commencement of the construction of its railway, at the city of Sacramento, until about the month of November, 1867, contracted with said Central Pacific to furnish the materials for and to construct, furnish, and equip so much of said railroad and telegraph line as was constructed, furnished, and equipped, or partly constructed, furnished, and equipped prior to the 1st day of November, 1867.

That such contract and contracts were caused to be made in the name of said Central Pacific, by the votes and directions of said Leland Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, Charles and E. B. Crocker, and their confederates, and who composed a majority of the board of directors of said Central Pacific, with said C. Crocker & Co., a copartnership of which the said last-named defendants were members, for their joint and individual profit and gain, and the prices and rates at which the same were let were exorbitant and excessive, to wit, at the rate, as plaintiff is informed and believes, of 200 per cent. over and above the actual and reasonable cost and expense of the work done, and the materials, furniture, and equipments furnished, in the name of said C. Crocker & Co., whereby the said last-named defendants did receive from said Central Pacific, and did appropriate to their own use, and did vote to themselves, under the pretense of being directors of said Central Pacific, large sums of money, bonds, and assets of said Central Pacific, to wit, as near as plaintiff can estimate the same, $7,000,000 in value, over and above the actual cost of the work done, and the materials, furniture, and equipments furnished in the name of or under the direction of said C. Crocker & Co.

That afterward, to wit, on or about the 18th day of November, 1867, the said defendants, Huntington, Hopkins, Leland Stanford, C. and E. B. Crocker, and divers others, their associates and confederates, to plaintiff unknown, combining and confederating together to cheat and defraud plaintiff and the other stockholders of the Central Pacific, and the said Central Pacific, and fraudulently to acquire and to appropriate to themselves without consideration or a just equivalent large profits and gains, and large amounts of the assets and property of the said Central Pacific, organized themselves and some of their servants and employés to plaintiff unknown, under the laws of the State of California, into a corporation styled the "Contract and Finance Company," for the purpose of taking contracts for the construction of subdivisions of the railroad and telegraph line of said Central Pacific, and the appurtenances necessarily connected therewith, and the equipping and furnishing the same.

That from and after the organization of said Contract and Finance Company, all the contracts made and entered into in the name of the said Central Pacific for materials to be furnished for and work to be done in the construction, furnishing, and equipment of said railroad and telegraph line, were by said Leland Stanford, Hopkins, Huntington, C. and E. B. Crocker, and their confederates, composing a majority of the directors of said Central Pacific, voted to be let, and in fact were let, and entered into by said Central Pacific of the one part, and the said "Contract and Finance Company" of the other part, without advertising to let the same to the lowest bidders or bidder, and without in any manner inviting competition therefor.

That under the fraudulent and illegal pretense of paying for said materials, work, equipment, and furniture, nominally contracted to be furnished and done by said "Contract and Finance Company," but really and in fact by said last-mentioned directors and their confederates, for their own benefit, the said last-mentioned directors and their confederates from time to time voted to pay, deliver, and make over, and did pay, deliver, and make over, in the name of said Central Pacific, to said "Contract and Finance Company" and its confederates large sums of money and large amounts of bonds, lands, and other valuable assets of said Central Pacific of great value, to wit, of the value, as plaintiff is informed and believes, of $225,855,618.17.

That said last-mentioned moneys, bonds, subsidies, lands, and other valuable assets so made over, transferred, and delivered to said "Contract and Finance Company," were in value greatly in excess, to wit, to the amount of $206,632,661.50½, of the actual cost of and of a fair price for all materials, furniture, and equipments furnished by and work done by said "Contract and Finance Company," or by its subcontractors or employés, in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and the appurtenances thereof, and the said last-mentioned sum, in excess of the sum in which the same could have been let out for and contracted to be done and furnished for by responsible persons and firms who did not intend to cheat and defraud the said Central Pacific, the plaintiff, and the other stockholders of the said Central Pacific.

The said defendants, Leland Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, E. B. and C. Crocker, heretofore, to wit, on or about the 20th day of July, 1869, under the name of said "Contract and Finance Company," divided among themselves the said $206,632,661.50½ in value of the assets, subsidies, and property of said Central Pacific, so as aforesaid delivered to said "Contract and Finance Company," but in what proportions the plaintiff is ignorant, but is informed and believes, and therefore avers, upon and according to his information and belief, that the said sum was so divided in the proportions of one-fifth to each of the last-named defendants.

And the plaintiff avers, on and according to his information and belief, that said "Contract and Finance Company" did sublet the greater portion of the work to be done, and which was done, and the materials to be furnished, and which were furnished in the construction of the said telegraph and railroad line under its contracts with said Central Pacific at prices greatly below, to wit, more than 1,000 per cent. below the prices which said Central Pacific nominally undertook to pay to said "Contract and Finance Company" for doing the same work, and furnishing the same materials.

It will be seen from the above statement that Mr. Brannan swears that the cost of constructing the Central Pacific Railroad from Sacramento to Ogden, a distance of 777 miles, was $20,000,000, or about $25,700 per mile; and in further evidence of Mr. Brannan's statement, I need only add that the directors of the company settled with him, and never denied his allegations.

This in itself is proof sufficient that the statements were in the main correct.

I now ask if, as Mr. Brannan swears, the road cost but $25,700 per mile, what would be the difference between the cost as sworn to by the above-named gentleman and $113,000 per mile as asserted by the directors of the Contract Finance Company? Simply $87,300 per mile. But allowing the road cost $50,000 per mile, which it did not, there is still a gain of $63,000 per mile to be pocketed by the directors of this Contract Finance Company.

It is further asserted by these same directors that it cost $90,000 per mile to construct railroads in California, that is, the roads that are part of the Central Pacific, and for which they received subsidies, as alleged by Mr. Brannan; and as will appear by reference to statutes, namely, the Sacramento Valley, the road to Redding, the San Joaquin Valley, the Copperopolis, Santa Clara, Western Union, and branch roads connected therewith, all of which were constructed with the proceeds and dividends acquired by defrauding the Government and stockholders, as alleged by Mr. Brannan.

I deny in toto the statement that it cost $90,000 per mile to build railroads in my State, and if a thorough investigation is made, it will show that these roads were constructed as cheaply, if not cheaper than any other roads in the United States.

Aside from the fact that for miles they traverse through valleys and broad level plains, they were built mainly with cooly labor, their ties and wood-work cut from the mountain-sides on the line of the road, and almost everything necessary for their construction within easy reach. The fact, therefore, is as clear as the sun at noonday that this road and its branches could not have cost on an average $111,000 or $113,000 per mile, and if such was the case, I simply ask how can its directors account for the fact that at the present time they assess its value as only worth from five to seven thousand dollars per mile. (See Report State Board of Equalization, California, pages 21, 99, 100, 101.) What a shrinkage in value from $113,000 to $7,000 per mile.

I need only say in further evidence of the fraudulent transactions of this company that all efforts to examine books and papers have been frustrated and disallowed by its directors, that when the Placer Company, which had taken $250,000 of its stock, demanded an investigation through its board of supervisors, and San Francisco, which had taken some $600,000 of its stock, demanded an investigation through its mayor, they were not only met with a positive refusal on the part of the directors to allow such an investigation, but inducements of all kinds were held out to the parties who endeavored to make the investigation to desist from it, and the investigators were asked to sign a paper carefully prepared by the directors of the Central Pacific, to the effect that such an investigation had been made and resulted in the complete exoneration of the said directors. In one instance a direct effort was made to bribe one of the board of supervisors, as will be shown by his affidavit which I now read:

On the 14th day of September, A. D. 1864, and immediately after the attempt to examine the books of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, Charles Crocker, the superintendent of the company, drove over to the Orleans Hotel in Sacramento City and asked me to get in and take a ride. I objected, but finally got into the buggy with him. Crocker's first words were, "Well, what do you think of the examination?" I replied, "I think the examination a farce, and the whole affair a swindle." His answer was, "Why, you have not seen anything have you?" I said, "No; but your report says, We have carefully examined the books of the company, and you know that we have not." He said, "Well, never mind that; you sign the report and we will make a rich man of you." I answered, "Mr. Crocker, that report is a lie, and I cannot do it; but if you will throw open your books, and if they will justify it, I will be the first one to put my name to a favorable report." "Never mind," said he, "now you know the value of the Clipper Gap Station, I will see that you have that, and if you are not satisfied with your position on the road I will put you in any one you want, and you know that I can do it." I said, "The report is not true, and I cannot do it." He then said, "Rogers, you do not know what you are bringing on you. You are commencing the fiercest war you can imagine. It will be a powerful corporation against an individual, and while your report will hurt us we will crush you." I answered, "Crush away." He then said, "Rogers, this is an institution but just commenced. There is a great future. Every man of us can make a fortune, and we can let you know of many things that will put money in your pocket. I will tell you of one. We intend to depreciate the stock, and we will make the counties sick of their investment. Then we can get a law passed allowing the counties to sell their stock, and we will buy it in and you shall be one of us." And right here let me remark that such laws were passed through the Legislature, the stock was depreciated and bought by the railroad managers from the counties who were anxious to dispose of it, fearing a still further depreciation, and the county of Sacramento for one lost largely, only receiving about seventy cents on the dollar. I said, "Crocker, I will not do it. Drive me back to the Orleans."

He then said, "Rogers, if you speak of these things I will shoot you." I told him that I rather thought not.

[SEAL.] WALTER B. LYON,
Recorder and Ex-officio Clerk of the Board of Supervisors of Placer County.

On the evening of the 14th day of September, A. D. 1864, D. W. Madden came to me and said, "Rogers, you know my ranch." I said "No." He answered, "Well, I have as fine a ranch as any one; as good as Dickerson's. Now, if you will sign that report," meaning the majority report, "I will give you a deed of the property." I said, "Wash., never; I cannot do it. The report got up in the railroad office is a damned lie, and you know that they are robbing their country and I will not be a party to it."

JAMES R. ROGERS.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, County of Placer, ss:

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 14th day of September, A. D. 1864.

WALTER B. LYON,
Recorder and Ex-officio Clerk of the Board of Supervisors, Placer County.

In order to show more completely the immense subsidies received by this company, I refer the members of this House to the United States Statutes at Large, and statutes of California and Nevada, for the several land grants, bonds, money, right of way, and other donations granted by the United States, the States of California and Nevada, and the several counties of those States as mentioned therein.

I have not thoroughly examined the statutes of Nevada, but I find that in 1869 the Legislature authorized the issue by the several counties of nearly $2,000,000 in bonds and other subsidies, the most of which, no doubt, inured to the benefit of the Central Pacific.

I also refer to the concurrent resolutions of the California Legislature, alleging fraud in the management of the affairs of the Contract Finance Company and demanding an investigation, which I will now read:

Assembly concurrent resolution relative to the Central Pacific, the Western Pacific, and the California and Oregon Railway Companies.

Whereas a resolution with a preamble has been introduced and is now pending in the Congress of the United States, in which preamble it is specifically charged that the Central Pacific, the Western Pacific, and the California and Oregon Railway Companies have received donations and subsidies from the United States, and from the State of California and certain counties and municipalities within that State, and also from the State of Nevada and the Territory of Utah, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $156,825,000, which donations and subsidies were granted to said railway companies for the sole purpose of aiding them in the construction, equipment, and maintenance of their railways, and that the directors of said railroad companies corruptly entered into contracts with themselves for the construction of said railways, under the name of Charles Crocker & Co. and the name of the Contract and Finance Company, whereby a large portion of said subsidies and donations has been unlawfully diverted from the legitimate object for which they were granted by said directors and fraudulently converted by them to their own individual use and emolument; and whereas said resolution provides for the appointment of a committee by Congress invested with ample powers to inquire into said alleged fraudulent contracts, and also to inquire into and report to Congress upon all matters and transactions touching the construction and management of said railways, and all the affairs and transactions of said Charles Crocker & Co. and the said Contract and Finance Company in connection therewith; and whereas it is the opinion of the Legislature of the State of California, now in session, that such investigation should be made: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Assembly, (the senate concurring,) That our Representatives in Congress be requested and our Senators instructed to use all honorable efforts to secure at the earliest practicable moment the passage of said resolution by Congress, and that the governor be requested to transmit forthwith a copy of this resolution to each of our Representatives and Senators.

MORRIS M. ESTEE,
Speaker of the Assembly.
R. PACHERO,
President of the Senate.

I also desire to add further, in connection with this subject of subsidies, that the Government has voted to corporations 220,858,338 acres of the public domain, or 10,600,000 acres more than the area of the Eastern States, and 138,173,218 acres more than is comprised in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. (See Land Office Report for 1873.) This land is selling from five to seven dollars per acre; and the Central Pacific and its branches have received 13,000,000 acres. Government valuation $32,500,000; railroad average sales at $4.50 per acre, $58,500,000. In addition to this the Government has loaned its credit to the Pacific Railroads to the extent of $64,623,512, and paid interest amounting to $22,386,691.62, and there is still a balance due of $646,235.12, making a total when the entire amount is paid of $87,656,438.74, of which the Central Pacific has received $34,583,156.87. The total mileage constructed under the authority and by aid of Congress has been 2,500 miles. Toward the construction of these roads the Government has issued its 6 per cent. currency bonds upon 300 miles at the rate of $48,000 per mile; upon 976 miles at the rate of $32,000 per mile, and upon 1,244 miles at the rate of $16,000 per mile. (See Poor's Railroad Manual, and acts of Congress.)

If the Government continues paying simple interest for thirty years on the principal outstanding, ($64,623,512,) it will have paid to these Pacific roads the sum of $116,322,321.60, amounting, principal and interest, to $180,945,833.60; while if it deals with these roads and corporations as business men do with one another, and which it should do, compounding the interest at 6 per cent. per annum, semi-annually, the enormous sum of $382,022,910.69 will have been paid from the public Treasury and the purses of the people.

I also submit for consideration the following statement of the net earnings of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, as shown by Poor's Railroad Manual for 1873:

1865	280,272 39
1866	664,206 96
1867	1,087,901 22
1868	$1,469,776 36
1869	2,591,497 00
1870	3,800,761 34
1871	5,171,192 95
1872	7,290,019 84
1873, as shown by railroad reports	8,281,649 00
Total	30,684,148 97

And yet out of these immense profits the directors have never declared a dividend to the stockholders, nor paid a cent of interest to the Government, but as sworn to by Mr. Brannan, and undenied by the directors of the company, have bought up other roads, and divided among themselves the surplus earnings.

I have also carefully compiled from Poor's Railroad Manual for 1874 a statement showing the comparative earnings of railroads per mile in different sections of the country, from which it will be seen that roads in the Pacific States earn more per capita than in any other section:

	Per mile.	Per capita.
New England States	$10,636 00	$13 53
Middle States	14,565 00	15 86
Western States	6,375 00	13 76
Southern States	4,350 00	4 31
Pacific States	10,161 00	17 00

I annex herewith a table prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury showing the bonds issued to and interest payable from the several Pacific Railroad Companies:

Bonds issued to the Pacific Railway Companies under authorizing acts of July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864, interest payable in lawful money.

The foregoing is a correct statement of the public debt, as appears from the books and Treasurer's returns in the Department at the close of business, January 31, 1874.

WILLIAM A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

It will be seen from this statement that the Central Pacific and Western Pacific (one and the same corporation) have received amounts as follows:

Central Pacific	$7,886,657 63
Western Pacific	535,662 64

To sum up briefly, I find that the Central Pacific Railroad Company has received in bonds, land grants, and other subsidies, $156,825,360; add to this the net profits, $30,684,148.97, and interest paid by the United States, $8,422,320,27; making a total of $195,931,829.24; deduct from this the probable cost of the road, which does not exceed $45,000,000, and it leaves $150,931,829.24 to be divided among the Contract Finance Company or Credit Mobilier of the Central Pacific.

I now desire to call your attention to another statement. In the State of California alone, five years ago, according to the statement of the directors, the Central Pacific road, independent of depots and other improvements, was valued at $116,865,240; number of miles 1,052.84; cost per mile, $111,000. In 1873 the assessed value of their entire property in the State of California, as shown by the report of the State board of equalization, was only $12,289,008, making a difference in the value of their property between 1865 and 1873 of $104,576,232.

The question now arising is how is it possible for a road valued in 1865 at $116,000,000 to shrink in value $104,000,000 inside of eight years? If this state of affairs continues for eight years longer the road will be worth nothing, and the Government and stockholders will never receive a dollar.

I appeal to this House to consider this matter seriously, that one of your great Pacific railroads has declined in value $13,000,000 per year, and this statement is made in the face of the fact that its net earnings have increased from $46,871.91 per year in 1864 to $8,281,649 in 1873, as shown by the report of its directors. How can you reconcile the difference? By what magic power can the directors account for such a depreciation? Does this not show a damnable fraud? For what purpose is this value of but $12,000,000 placed upon a property in 1873 that was valued in 1865 at nearly ten times as much? I will not answer the question. The stockholders who for years have never received a dividend, the Government that has never received its interest, and the tax-payers of the entire country will answer. It needs no comment. On its face it bears the stamp of roguery, deception, and crime.

And here let me add that even with the low assessment of $12,000,000 placed upon their property in my State the managers of this company have refused year after year to pay the State taxes, and within the last year have commenced suit in the counties of Nevada, Placer, Sacramento, San Joaquin, Almeda, and Santa Clara against the tax-collectors, and have procured injunctions restraining the collection of the taxes assessed. (See report State board of equalization. 1873.)

I defy the directors of this company to deny the truth of these statements. I defy them to show that they have grown poor, or that their road to-day is worth less than it was eight years ago. I defy them to show any part of their road, excepting a small portion in the Sierra Nevada mountains, that will begin to compare in cost with the cost of roads in the Eastern States.

I have cited authorities and facts that are indisputable to show that the worst frauds ever perpetrated upon this American continent have been committed by the directors of this road and its Contract Finance Company; to show that these Pacific Railroad corporations are reeking with guilt and perjury; that facts have been misrepresented and reports made which are false in every particular; that when legislation is needed at the hands of Congress or of a State the expenses and value of the road are represented in one light, but when bonds are to be disposed of by capitalists in this country and in Europe they are represented in another; and under the most specious and plausible promises are disposed of at a high figure to the poor workingmen of Europe and America, who find, alas, too late that they have been gulled and defrauded of the savings, perhaps, of a lifetime.

As a further evidence that the moneys received by this company were misappropriated and divided among the directors of the Contract Finance Company, I assert as a notorious fact that in 1862, when this company was organized, its directors were comparatively poor men, and were not ranked even among the men of easy circumstances in the Golden State; yet within six short years after they became directors of the Central Pacific Railroad and Contract Finance Company they were known as millionaires. Crocker sells out for $14,000,000, and his brother, who by the way was only acting as attorney for the company, disposes of his interest for $4,000,000. Stanford is reputed to be worth $20,000,000, and so on through the list of directors. Each is a millionaire, while the Government and people have been defrauded.

How is it with the stockholders outside the ring? Well, I will name two of my own acquaintances: Colonel Lindsey, a farmer of Sacramento County, subscribed to the stock, and paid up every dollar in gold coin nearly twelve years since; kept his stock ten years, and by hard work succeeded in selling for seventy-five cents on the dollar, losing 25 per cent. and the use of his money for ten years. Mr. Egles, an honest old man, was induced to subscribe for stock, paid his gold coin, still holds his stock, and cannot even get seventy-five cents on the dollar or anything else, while Government officials and members of the United States Congress receive $2.25 for each dollar subscribed.

And yet the Central Pacific road cannot pay the interest on its bonds, can declare no dividend to its stockholders, and refuses to pay its taxes to the State government of California. It is poor and needy, and I trust before the end of this present Congress that a thorough investigation will leave it sick and sore of its guilt and purge it of its corruption. It cannot pay its interest. Yet Poor's Railroad Manual, 1868, page 50, says:

> The interest liabilities of the Central Pacific Railroad Company are even now (1868-'69) less than a third of the net earnings of the road pledged.

I will further add that Attorney-Generals Akerman and Williams have both decided that the interest on their bonds is due and payable semi-annually, and not at the maturity of the bonds, as contended by the managers of the Central Pacific.

I also desire to call your attention to the closing paragraph of section 6 of the act of July 2, 1862, which expressly states that "after said road was completed until said bonds and interest are paid, at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings of said road shall also be annually applied to the payment thereof."

This is an express provision of the law incorporating the Pacific road, yet for years it has been utterly disregarded. Is it not our duty as legislators to thoroughly investigate these Pacific roads and demand an enforcement of the law? The Government and people demand an investigation into the affairs of this company, and if such an investigation is made, a fraud will be unearthed so deep and damnable, that the Credit Mobilier will be forgotten; a fraud that will sink into eternal infamy the men who have organized and shared in it. An investigation can do no harm. If these Pacific Railroad Companies have dealt honestly by the Government and people, it will injure no man or bodies of men to compel a fair exhibit of the books and accounts; and if fraud has been committed, it is due to honest government, due to the country, and to the honest, toiling tax-payers of the land that the fraud should be unearthed, its perpetrators held up to the scorn of the nation, and compelled to disgorge and surrender to the Government and the people their ill-gotten gains. Every business man renders an account and prepares a balance-sheet at least once a year; but how is it with the giant and soulless corporations that are feasting upon the substance and hard earnings of the laboring poor of the country? Have they submitted their annual balance-sheet? No, sir! Nearly twelve years have passed, and yet no account, no statement to the Government that enriched them, and none the people from whom they have received and exacted so much.

Can we as representatives of a free people pass this thing coolly by? Shall we return to our constituents with the blush of shame on our cheek, knowing that we have countenanced fraud and failed to do our duty? No, gentlemen; I say we must compel an accounting to the people by these corporations; the people demand it and will have it, and the man who dares to oppose a thorough investigation, a full enforcement of the laws, and a thorough accountability of the operations of these gigantic corporations, will never again occupy a seat in the Congress of the nation by the suffrages of his constituency, and God forbid that he ever should. I demand this investigation in the name and behalf of my Government; I demand it in behalf of the tax-paying people of our common country, who have contributed nearly nine-tenths of the cost of these roads; I demand it in behalf of over one million grangers and Patrons of Husbandry; I demand it in behalf of the working men and women of our land; I demand it in the name of justice and equity; I demand it as a right which every citizen of this Government possesses to know what disposition is made of the hard earnings of the people, who are suffering with taxation and oppressed with burdens; as a laboring man and tax-payer I demand it; and as one reared to toil I demand in behalf of my toiling kindred and brethren the adoption of the measures now under consideration.

The boast of parties is that all men are created with equal rights and privileges. If such be the case, equal rights and common justice demand at our hands as the representatives of the people that we be taxed according to our possessions; that the law of the land be applied to corporations as well as individuals, and that they be made to pay the interest due the Government; that labor be rewarded; that honest toil be fully recompensed; that the Government be managed in the interest of the people, and not in the interest of land rings, railroad rings, bloated corporations, and monopolies. I appeal to the members of this House to lay aside all party prejudices, to rise above all partisan feelings, and to act in this matter for the best interests and welfare of our people.

In conclusion, I only have to say that the Credit Mobilier investigation was, as I before stated, originated by a simple resolution in the Forty-second Congress. No reference to a regular committee, or no argument before a committee was made by the mover of the resolution. It resulted in exposing a gigantic fraud, and when an investigation is made in accordance with the resolution which I have submitted, a fraud will have been uncovered before which the Credit Mobilier was but a pigmy or semblance; you will have done your duty as representatives of the people, and I shall have fulfilled my obligations to my Government, my constituency, and my conscience.

ABUSES IN THE PUBLIC PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Speaker, this Congress cannot, in safety to its own reputation, adjourn without taking some measures to remedy the abuses which exist in the Public Printing Office. We cannot close our eyes to the fact that abuses do exist there. The press of the country, irrespective of parties, has called our attention to it. If we but open our eyes and look around us we can see multiplied evidences of it. If we but open and look into the report of the Congressional Printer we see these abuses sticking out at the knees and elbows.

What I have to say upon this occasion shall be in arraignment of a system, not of an individual, and if what I may say of the Congressional Printer shall seem to be of a personal character, it is so because the system of legislation under which he acts makes it necessary. Learning that such abuses did exist, early in the session I introduced a resolution on the subject, and had it referred to the Committee on Printing, of which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DONNAN] is chairman. Before this committee the Congressional Printer, Mr. Clapp, was requested to appear; this he declined to do, on the grounds, as I have been informed, that he was an officer of the Senate, and was responsible to that body alone. Owing to this refusal to appear and testify before the House Committee on Printing, my resolution failed, and the committee reported a joint resolution, and have in pursuance of that resolution taken some testimony, and have just made report to this House. I have refrained from speaking upon this subject until that report was made. The day of adjournment not being far off, I feel it to be my duty to call the attention of the House to the subject now, so that it can, should it see fit, correct existing abuses by proper and necessary legislation.

The refusal of Mr. Clapp to appear before the House Committee on Printing, I will remark in passing, has had one good effect, namely, it has opened the eyes of Congress to the absurdity of making the Congressional Printer an officer of the Senate; and I hope that the amendment of my friend from New York [Mr. HALE] which was put in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill by an almost unanimous vote of the House will be adhered to by it. This House is powerless to protect itself against this abuse if the Senate committee is to control this whole subject, for it is clear that the chairman of that committee in the Senate either cannot or will not see anything wrong in the present Public Printer or in the system under which he is acting.

Abuses in public printing, so far as the experience of our national Government goes, seem to be inseparable from the very subject. This, too, is the experience of every State in the Union. So outrageous had these abuses become in my own State that the public printing there is regulated by a wise provision in our new constitution. It is a system of gross favoritism universally abused, not only in the purchase of paper and other material, but in the printing and binding.

No one who has paid the least attention to the subject will say that the Government can do its printing as cheap as individuals can do it. Indeed this is true of almost every enterprise. In the management of a Government establishment under a superintendent, working for a fixed salary, you have the absence of that keen interest, that watchfulness and care, which characterize the individual whose whole fortune is embarked perhaps in the undertaking. The individual will take care to buy his material where he can buy the cheapest; see that the weight is full and strong; that his employés make full time, and that waste and extravagance are avoided. No Congressman can compel him to employ some dead-beat of a "jour," whom no well-managed establishment would receive for a moment, or some politician who must be provided for whether there is work for him to do or not.

The history of our present printing office is the repeated experience of all the other Bureaus of the Government, namely, that of rapid growth. And it is only by constant watching and perpetual resistance that this office has not outgrown all the ideas of its founders. Every year we witness a contest over the Bureaus of Education and Agriculture. They seem determined to expand beyond what was ever contemplated, and Congress has all it can do to resist these expansions.

This establishment, small and humble at first, has grown to be the largest in the country. A building 675 feet long—larger by 73 feet than this Capitol—four stories high, filled with the best presses in the world, employing over 1,500 persons, purchasing 32½ tons of types last year, 17½ of which were purchased for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD alone, and requiring an appropriation larger than the entire annual civil expenses of the Government during Jackson's administration, and this amount is constantly on the increase. And what is a remarkable fact, the Congressional Printer is constantly soliciting more printing from Congress, although he is an officer with a fixed annual salary, not in any way depending upon the amount of printing done. Yet Mr. Clapp goes about these Halls like some Oliver Twist "asking for more." This wears an ugly look, in connection with the fact stated in the newspapers in this city that Mr. Clapp has a son in a Baltimore house where most of the paper used in public printing is purchased.

Mr. Clapp may be innocent, but he subjects himself to a fearful suspicion. But two or three years ago an investigation into one of our leading religious book concerns in New York City developed a similar relation between one of the officers of that concern and the firm furnishing the paper.

Mr. Speaker, in connection with this subject of public printing we must not forget the exact bearing which the abolition of the franking privilege has upon it. I voted for its abolition and against every attempt to restore it directly or indirectly, except so far as country newspapers are concerned. I also believe that it will never be restored, and that the saving to the tax-payers was not so much by what it may increase the revenues of the Post-Office Department as by what it diminishes the amount of public printing. That the abolition of the franking privilege will greatly decrease the public printing all must admit. Since its complete abolition in March, 1873, not one public document for general distribution has been ordered to be printed.

The reason is obvious; the postage on these books would be nearly as great as the pay of a member. Besides, three-fourths of these documents are not worth the postage; no constituent would pay it to have one. It is notorious that but once in a great while there is one worth printing. Take the abridged messages and documents, commerce and navigation reports, the reports of the heads of the various Departments, the report of the Commissioner of Education, and, with the exception of the last, no constituent would thank a member if he sent one of them to him "postage prepaid;" because he may wade through volume after volume in the hope that he may find some new thought, some idea worthy to be treasured up, but when he gets through he will find his search in vain. The messages and documents at best possess but an ephemeral interest. Those who feel enough interest in them to read them will do so as they appear in the newspapers at the time of their communication to Congress. But who a year after their transmission to Congress will take the pains to go through this mountain of chaff in order that he may perhaps find a grain of wheat? Not one in ten thousand.

Yet as long as these books passed through the mails free, Congressmen would frank them to their constituents, for it was about the easiest way to get rid of them. There are not ten members on this floor to-day who would vote to print any of these books, simply because they know they are not worth one-half the price of the postage, nor the tenth part of the cost of paper, printing, and binding. Just how much the public printing will be diminished it is hard now to say; but it certainly will reach 50 per cent.

This being so, Mr. Speaker, no more favorable opportunity will be presented for disposing of this elephant which we now find on our hands. It is a grave economical question, involving millions of dollars, whether we will modify existing legislation, or whether we will change the method of doing the public printing, and award it to the lowest responsible bidder. The latter method in my mind is the correct one, and every tax-payer in the country has a vital interest in the change, especially as it is becoming apparent that we must increase taxation to carry on the expenses of the Government. If this Congress adjourns without action being taking to correct this abuse, those who are more immediately responsible for the legislation done here will be called to a fearful account in the coming elections.

Let us now examine somewhat in detail the management of the Office of Public Printing. The act of Congress requires the Congressional Printer to report annually, "showing the exact condition of the printing, binding, and engraving, the amount of paper purchased for the same, and such further information as may be within his knowledge in regard to all matters connected therewith," &c. Notwithstanding this provision of law requiring exact information on the subject of public printing, I challenge any member on this floor to take up any of Mr. Clapp's annual reports and say if he has given anything like exact information. On the contrary, his reports are studiously and purposely inexact and uncertain; so much so that when Mr. Clapp gets before an investigating committee it is impossible for him or the committee to say what the public printing does cost.

Look at this report for the year ending September 30, 1873. This report is without a parallel. It is not like unto "anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the waters under the earth," unless we except the cuttle-fish, which is said by naturalists to possess the power of rendering itself invisible by injecting into the water an inky fluid. It seems to be prepared on purpose to conceal the workings of the office and to mislead any one who does not give it a careful examination. I say it without fear of contradiction that there are not five statements in it that can be relied on.

As a specimen of book-keeping it is a model. The Congressional Printer has adopted the "double-entry" system, except occasionally when the treble entry was better adapted to the object in view. To my mind Mr. Clapp would have appeared to better advantage had he just frankly said, "I acknowledge I have not kept any correct account of material and labor, &c., but I managed in some way to use up $2,085,238, and I thought it would be just as well to apportion this sum to the several jobs I have done. It may be I have charged the Post-Office and other Departments too much, but sometimes I have charged Congress too little." This is in effect what he does now say, although in his report he professes to be giving things at their cost.

In the first place I assert that the Congressional Printer does not account for the sum of $49,317.30 which his own reports show he had on hand on the 30th day of September, 1873. This is such a serious charge that I ask the House to examine the reports and see if the following statement made by Mr. Church before the Committee on Printing be not correct:

Statement of balances of printing paper at Government Printing Office, from October 1, 1869, to September 30, 1873, as shown from Congressional Printer's official reports.

From this statement it is seen that under Mr. Clapp's system of book-keeping nearly $50,000 have dropped out in the item of paper alone.

On page 13 of the report for 1873 he says he printed 10,000 copies, of 790 pages each, of the report of commerce and navigation, and charged for cost of work, paper, and binding the sum of $3,595.01. This job required 499 reams of paper, and the cost per ream, according to the report, would be $7.20. But this paper cost only $6.00 per ream; an overcharge of $1.20 per ream, or 20 per cent. above the actual cost, and amounting to about $600 on the whole job.

Again, on page 15 of the same report, he charges for printing 2,500 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1872, consisting of 8 pages each, $32.83. This required about 1¼ reams of paper, charging per ream about $26; about three times what it actually cost the Public Printer.

On page 14 of the same report he claims that he published 1,650 copies, of 250 pages each, of the report of the board of public works of the District of Columbia; cost of paper reported at $242.08. This job required 26 reams, at $9 per ream; another overcharge of at least $1.80 per ream, or of 20 per cent.

So you may go on through the whole report, and you will find the same overcharges in nearly every instance. Take the report on the foreign relations of the United States, amounting to some 30,500 volumes in all, and the paper charged for this job averages about $7.86 per ream. That this is wrong we have only to remember that the Public Printer has nowhere any account of paper costing this sum used in this kind of printing.

And here I would remark that Mr. Clapp, through a whitewashing report made by the chairman of the Senate Committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the printers of Washington on the subject of public printing, attempts to break the force of these criticisms on the cost of printing by saying that the calculations of the memorialists were based on erroneous suppositions as to the quantity, the quality, and the consequent cost of the paper used. As to the quantity of paper used, Mr. Clapp himself gives us that; and the different formulas adopted in arriving at the exact quantity are so nearly the same, that the discrepancy is trifling. But he claims the memorialists made an "erroneous supposition" as to the quality of the paper used. How easily Mr. Clapp might have saved the memorialists from falling into this "erroneous supposition," if like a correct and honest officer he had stated the quality of the paper used in his report. The law requires him to give the "exact condition of the printing," &c., and by purposely withholding such information his report is unsatisfactory, and gives no information of the cost of public printing. Quantity and quality are the only elements entering into the cost of paper; to give the quantity and omit the quality gave no more exact information than to omit the quantity and give the quality.

But Mr. Clapp is careful to say in his communication to the chairman of the Committee on Public Printing that in one "example" uncalendered 45-pound paper was taken by Mr. Judd when calendered 53-pound paper was used. But, Mr. Speaker, the Congressional Printer is silent as to the other "examples;" it is fair to suppose that if he had the same reply to make to the other criticisms he would have made it. But who is correct about this paper? Other parties, practical printers, have weighed the books and say that the paper used is uncalendered 45-pound paper.

More than that, Mr. Clapp, on page 4 of his last report, says that under the direction of the Committee on Printing he entered into a contract with Wheelwright, Mudge & Co., of Baltimore, for 30,000 reams of uncalendered 45-pound printing-paper for the year ending December 31, 1873. The average cost of this paper per ream was $5.78. It is true he had some of last year's paper over, and that cost him more; but allowing him the very highest price paid for uncalendered paper remaining over, it would only cost $6.38½. Now where has the Public Printer used the uncalendered paper of 1872, costing $6.38½ per ream, or of 1873, costing $5.78 per ream? There is no place for it.

No, Mr. Speaker; I repeat that the report is loosely and vaguely drawn on purpose to leave a loop-hole for Mr. Clapp to creep out should he ever be questioned. He has been questioned, and you can see how he attempts to get out. On page 6 of the report for 1872 the Congressional Printer says, during the past year, 119,284 pages of documentary composition have been completed. On page 25 of the same report he also gives the summary of documentary composition at 119,284 pages. By reference to pages 14, 19, and 23, I find the Ku-Klux report, a book consisting of 13 volumes, and containing about 8,000 pages, charged three times. By this treble-entry system of book-keeping, Mr. Clapp takes a credit for 16,000 pages of composition which was never done. A mistake of 16,000 pages in an aggregate of 119,000 pages, will, I take it, inspire no great confidence in the accuracy of Mr. Clapp's report. Every one knows the cost of composition could only be incident to the first 8,000 pages.

The same principle of book-keeping was followed in printing the Congressional Directory for the third session of the Forty-second Congress. The first edition, consisting of 10,000 copies of 140 pages each, is stated to have cost $624.66; this of course included composition. Shortly after a second edition of the same number of copies was published costing $642.65, which includes composition a second time. Yet every member of Congress knows that the second edition is precisely like the first, with the exception of here and there a correction made necessary by a change of residence or the election of a new member.

On page 43 of the report he says the amount of savings in excess of expenditure is $264,812.11. How is this possible, if the Congressional Printer has only charged the cost of labor and material, as he contends? On his theory of charging Congress and the various Departments the cost of all work done, there is no room for profit or loss. Of course, Mr. Speaker, he could arrive at such a balance only by his hocus-pocus system of book-keeping. If the printer has obeyed the law there is no place for this balance. But when we come to the Post-Office Department we will then see how this balance is reached. For it is only put in the statement to mislead Congress by making it believe that a profit of nearly $265,000 has been realized during the last year.

Mr. Speaker, the law also requires the Congressional Printer to render to Congress and the Executive Departments a detailed statement of the accounts with the various public offices.

By reference to the annual reports of the Government Printing Office it will be seen that the accounts for work done for Congress are rendered very much in detail, while those for work done for the Departments are lumped; as for example, on page 28 of the last report the Congressional Printer says he has performed work for the Post-Office Department amounting to $220,000, and that is all we or the Department itself know about the matter. What the printing was, or the rates at which it has been charged, remains a profound mystery.

The printing for the various Executive Departments for last year, as stated in this report, amounted to $1,210,000, and for the five years past it has amounted to about $5,000,000. For this vast sum of money there has never been a voucher or detailed statement; nothing by which the accounts for the work could be examined or even known. We have the statement of the Congressional Printer that he has executed work to that extent at such prices as he has seen fit to charge, and these prices he has carefully withheld in direct violation of an express statute.

During the present session Messrs. Rives & Bailey, in their efforts to procure information for use before the committee, came upon the fact that this law had been persistently violated, and soon thereafter the Congressional Printer was instructed to render (from February 1) vouchers with each job of work done for the Departments. It thus came at last to be known at what prices he was charging for the work done in his office, and it was then plain enough to be seen why there had been no compliance with the law. At about this time the appropriation of $175,000 for printing for the Post-Office Department was exhausted, and the Postmaster-General came before the Committee on Appropriations to ask for an additional sum of money to enable his Department to get the necessary printing done for the remainder of the year. He was not willing to rest under the imputation of having squandered his appropriation in useless printing and fancy binding, and he therefore explained to the committee the manner in which his money was consumed. It there appeared that the prices charged against the Departments were perfectly unheard-of, out of all bounds of reason—from ten to twelve times the actual cost of the work done. One bill was rendered for $138, while the actual cost of that job was less than half of that sum. Another item charged at $140 was subsequently modified by the Congressional Printer himself and reduced to $11. There were many others of like character, but I will not take the time to enumerate them.

I will refer to one other instance only in this connection, and that because of the enormity of the overcharge. It was there shown that the Congressional Printer had been in the habit of charging $3.06 per 1,000 for printing a few words—about five in number—upon the envelopes used by the public officers. This work has been done on a press capable of printing 20,000 per day; and at this rate of charging the press was earning for his credit at the Treasury $61.20 per day, while the expense was $2 per day for a pressman and $1.50 each for two girls, making a total expense of $5. The expenses were $5 and the charge $61.20, or a little more than twelve times the actual cost!

What, Mr. Speaker, will the people think of our Public Printing

Office which eats up half a million dollars' worth of paper per annum, and then charges the Government twelve times the actual cost of labor expended upon it? Two million dollars a year are swallowed up in this manner by this gluttonous establishment, when respectable and responsible individuals are anxious even to do our printing for a much less sum of money.

When the Congressional Printer was confronted by these facts and expositions he had the unblushing effrontery to say that he was not aware his prices were so high; he had not examined them at all; he was pursuing the same system he found upon his entrance into office; but was now grateful that his attention had been called to the matter, and he would proceed to correct the wrong. He was thereupon requested to revise his charges for the work done for the Post-Office Department since the beginning of this fiscal year and see what the same would amount to on the basis of actual costs. He did so, and concludes he could return $40,000 to the credit of that Department. Just where the money came from to be placed to this credit I have not learned.

I now ask the House to listen to what he calls the actual expense of his work. For some half letter-sheets, circular forms, printed in large numbers for use in the business of the Post-Office Department, under the revised schedule the Congressional Printer has charged $5.41, $5.65, $6.32, and $6.60 per 1,000, including printing and paper. An offer was made to the Department, by a first-class printing establishment in this city, without any knowledge of the prices charged at the Government Printing Office, to print all that class of work on as good quality of paper for $4.50 per 1,000. Not long since the Congressional Printer ruled five reams of letter-paper for the Post-Office Department for which he charged, under his revised scale of prices, $6.88. A private binding and ruling establishment in this city charges for exactly the same work 75 cents per ream, or $3.75 for five reams, against the Congressional Printer's $6.88, which he says is the actual cost. This is 80 per cent. more than the private office charges for like work; and in addition to this the private office makes a satisfactory profit. The lowest price at which the Congressional Printer has printed the official envelopes since the revision of his rates is 90 cents per 1,000, and at this rate his press earns for his credit at the Treasury $18 per day on an expense of $5.

If these charges are correct, and no more than the cost of the work done, then the Government Printing Office had better be set on fire and burned down if no other way of disposing of it can be found. Private parties will do the work for much less money. If the charges are more than the costs of the work done, why are they so rendered? And what becomes of the large margin? If there were any money left on hand to the Congressional Printer's credit to represent these overcharges, a satisfactory explanation might be made; but the money is all gone, and as a general thing we have been called upon for a deficiency. During the last month of the last fiscal year the office was nearly closed up because the money was exhausted, and at the same time there was a great press of work to be done.

The only reasonable conclusion I can reach in reference to the matter is this: by this system the Congressional Printer has been enabled to report certain work as having been done at a remarkably low figure; and, sir, by this same system he has been enabled to do in his office many thousands of dollars' worth of printing and binding for private purposes for which no charge whatever has been made. When he was called upon two years ago for estimates in regard to the publication of the debates he well knew the work could not be done for the figures he submitted, and he also well knew that it would make no material difference, because he could easily cover up any deficiency by his regular system of overcharging the Departments.

As evidence that this powerful leverage has been used for this very purpose, I will refer you to a few examples. The cost of setting the type for the Ku-Klux report (on pages 19 and 23 of the annual report of December, 1872,) appears to have been about $6,600. This service could not have been performed for any less than $19,000; but it was desired that the expense should appear to be low, and therefore it was charged about one-third of the cost, well knowing that the deficiency was amply covered elsewhere. Another example of this may be found in the folding of the sheets of the Gongressional Globe, which work in connection with the binding has been done by the Congressional Printer. The folding and gathering of the sheets of the Globe during the past five years has cost the Government about $25,000, and this expenditure is omitted from the report altogether; not one dollar of it has ever been charged against the work, and the convenient system of book-keeping practiced in our public printing enables such things to be done with perfect ease and protection. There are scores of similar examples which might be referred to for the purpose of showing how this power has been used, but I will not pause here to allude to them. I have been thus particular in explaining the details of the system practiced by the Congressional Printer, that you may all understand just how easy it is for him to say that he is printing the debates within his estimates.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask your attention to his report of the cost of printing the RECORD during the executive session of the Senate in March, 1873, and we shall find here a forcible illustration of the convenient system of accounting already explained. On page 23 of the last annual report we find the charge entered for printing of the RECORD. The cost of the daily edition is stated to have been $249.26 for the 900 copies. This charge is said to cover paper, press-work, folding, stitching, and mailing, the type-setting being included in the charge entered against the book edition in the line below. When asked by the committee if there were any books in his office showing the separate items of expenditures making up that amount, he replied that he charged the work up according to his estimates, and he did not know whether there had been any detailed account of the expenditures kept or not. If there had been such a book he would have produced it; and we are left to understand that no such book has been kept. It would not suit his purpose to keep such a detailed account of cost; he well knew that his estimates were too low; and trusting to the system which had protected him thus far he depended upon it in this emergency to enable him to wrest the printing of the debates from the hands of the gentlemen who have served the Government honestly and faithfully so long.

By diligent and patient effort the committee at last succeeded in ascertaining from the employés of the office who were engaged upon this work that there was paid to them for this service $477.60; and by the testimony of the Congressional Printer the paper for it cost $170.81, making total cost $648.41, while it is stated in the official report to be $249.26; but a very little more than one-third of the actual cost. And the only excuse or apology offered by him for thus willfully falsifying his official statement to Congress was that he might conform to his estimates! What do you think, sir, of that style of book-keeping? Is it acceptable to Congress? Is it acceptable to the people, who furnish the money that is thus mysteriously manipulated? What is the necessity of thus flagrantly falsifying if the conduct of his office had been entirely straightforward and honest? If he has been laboring for the interests of the Government in the matter of printing the debates, why is there any occasion for him to conceal the truth?

When the Congressional Printer was asked if the cost of stereotyping the book edition was included in his statement of cost given in the annual report, he answered that it was not; that as stereotyping was not originally estimated for, it could not be included in his report, because he "charged the RECORD up just as the proposals read." He admitted the cost to be from 90 cents to $1 per page, and as there were 213 pages to be stereotyped, the cost at $1 per page must be $213. This sum is therefore to be added as a legitimate item in the cost of the work. In Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 5, first session Forty-third Congress, report of the Secretary of the Senate, it appears that the making of the index to the RECORD for the executive session cost $75. This money was not paid out by the Congressional Printer and therefore could not be reported by him, but as it is one of the elements of cost and always must be, it is to be added to the expense.

The cost of the book edition is given in the report as $2,104.86. This includes type-setting and the printing on the basis of the estimates. Now, if we bring these items together we shall have the following:

Book edition, including type-setting	$2,104 86
Daily edition	648 41
Stereotyping	213 00
Making index	75 00
Total	3,041 27

These items are none of them disputed by the Congressional Printer; they are all admitted to be correct, and we may therefore set this much down as definitely ascertained. This does not include anything for wear and tear of type and machinery, nor interest upon the investment employed. There are one or two items more claimed by Rives & Bailey as proper additions to the cost of the work, one of which is $125 for gas. The Congressional Printer disputed this item, and said there was no more gas consumed on account of the RECORD than there would have been if the work had not been done. As gas was consumed for two or three hours each morning in both the press-room and the folding-room, solely on account of the printing of the debates, I am unable to discover why there should not be some allowance made for this item of expense.

But suppose this and all other disputed items be omitted; suppose no account is taken of the many contingent items that always follow a large printing establishment, and suppose no allowance be made for wear and tear and interest on capital; we shall then have the acknowledgment of the Congressional Printer of $3,041.27 as the cost of the work. In his official report it is given to us as $2,354.12, only about three-fourths of the actual cost. On page 11 of the testimony there is a detailed statement showing that the entire cost to the Government of printing the proceedings of that session under proposition of Rives & Bailey would have been $2,889.26, which is 5 per cent. less than the acknowledged cost under the Congressional Printer; and they claim that the difference is really much greater than this. There is certainly this difference in their favor, beyond all possibility of dispute, and the difference is acknowledged by the Congressional Printer. But, sir, the proposition of Messrs. Rives & Bailey, now before the House, is even lower than the one submitted by them in February, 1873, and under which the above comparison is made. So if economy is shown in their favor on the basis of their first proposition, there will be much more under the one now proposed. What clearer, stronger evidence than this is desired? The Congressional Printer states on page 9 of his last report, that he had—

A fair opportunity for testing the capacity of this office for the work; and I am fully convinced, under that experience, that promptness and economy are secured by the transfer. Its resources are so manifold and its economy of labor and material is such that at least 30 per cent. of the money heretofore expended in accomplishing this work will be saved to the Government.

The Congressional Printer has here stated what he must have known to be a positive falsehood, and what he has since, before the committee, acknowledged to be such. Shall we tamely submit to this systematic deception at the hands of a public officer, and make no effort to inquire into the motive for such conduct?

I now come to the present session, and I had even more difficulty in arriving at the cost as the work is now being done, because there was a determined effort to deceive and mislead in every respect. I have not time now, nor is it necessary, to point out the inaccuracies and contradictions in the testimony. Any one who will give the case a careful reading will be able to see for himself.

In the course of the Congressional Printer's examination, he submitted a statement purporting to show the actual expenditure on account of the RECORD during the month of February, and he also applied his estimates to the services rendered for the purpose of showing a comparison between actual expense and his estimates of the same. This comparative statement may be found on page 40 of the testimony, and upon it we have had to depend largely for information. A careful analysis of it shows a result entirely different from that which it pretended to exhibit. From that statement the Congressional Printer would have us believe that he is now printing the debates nearly 20 per cent. less than his estimates, and if all his previous statements had been truthful we should have been inclined to accept that without question, because it bears upon the face of it the appearance of accuracy and a willingness to let the truth be known. But when misrepresentation and deception have been the rule, it will not do to accept anything without the closest scrutiny.

I will first analyze the application of the estimates to the work done, and we come upon the first misstatement in the first line. It is stated that the composition would, at $1.50 per 1,000 ems—the estimated cost—amount to $8,465.55. The actual measurement of matter was 5,484,000 ems, and at $1.50 per 1,000, the cost would be $8,226. The second misstatement is found in the fourth line. The 1,292 copies of the RECORD furnished to subscribers are put into this showing, not in accordance with the estimates, but at 17 cents per 100 pages, the rate at which they are furnished to subscribers, and which rate is nearly 10 per cent. higher than the estimates. Each copy of the RECORD for the month of February contained 868 pages or 54¼ sheets, and as the estimate was 2 cents for each additional sheet, 54¼ would amount to $1.08¼. This, then, is the price per copy of the RECORD under the estimates for the month of February, and 1,292 copies would amount to $1,401.82, instead of $1,906.47 as stated by the Congressional Printer.

The next item is press-work on documents, $723. There never was any estimate for document printing in connection with the printing of the RECORD, and the item should not be put into a statement which purports to be made out in accordance with the estimates. The last item is for press-work on RECORD, $155.80. This, sir, is barefaced impudence, or inexcusable ignorance, but it is in keeping with almost everything we get from that official. The estimate of the Congressional Printer included in plain terms the paper, the press-work, folding, mailing, and every possible service connected with the getting out of the daily edition, and the press-work is therefore included in the 2 cents per sheet before mentioned. There is no place in the estimates where press-work is provided for, nor is there the slightest justification in the world for the appearance of this item here. Why should he seek to put it in and thus endeavor to mislead us in our investigation in that way?

But these last two items, though neither of them has any business whatever in the statement, serve the purpose of exposing another instance of the Congressional Printer's charging exorbitant prices on some work that he may do another piece for little or nothing. He says there were 241,000 impressions of document work, costing $723. He also says there were 2,258 copies of the RECORD, 868 pages each, which would give 250,000 impressions, costing $155.80. Documents are charged at $3 per 1,000 and the RECORD at 62 cents per 1 000.

As we progress in this statement it is plain to be seen that its character is no better than that of everything else the Congressional Printer has given to us, notwithstanding its very bland appearance at first.

The cost under the estimates would be as follows:

Composition of debates, 5,484,000 ems, at $1.50	$8,226 00
Composition of documents in wasting time	220 44
500 copies daily to Congress	509 41
466 copies daily to Congress	505 61
1,292 copies daily to subscribers	1,401 82
Total	10,863 28

Now as to the actual cost. The pay-roll for the RECORD room we have no means of knowing anything about. Gas bill for RECORD-room is said to be $221.10. On page 8 of Mr. Church's closing statement before the committee will be found a letter from the secretary of the Gas-light Company, stating that of the one hundred and two burners in the room, twenty-four are supplied from a meter that is attached to another part of the building; therefore the meter in the RECORD room reports only about three fourths of the gas consumed in the room—another effort to make the expense appear as little as possible. Therefore we must add one-third of the gas reported in order to get the correct quantity. This makes that item $293.10. There are several omissions of expense which must be added. The clerk in the Senate post-office receives four dollars per day, and as he is said to perform some service at the office, mornings before coming to the Capitol, the Congressional Printer allows three-fourths of his wages to be charged to the RECORD.

There were 23 working days in February, and at $4 per day the salary of the clerk would amount to $92, three-fourths of which, $69, is chargeable to the RECORD. The next omission is the gas consumed in the press-room and folding-room, which the Congressional Printer allows to be $76.36. The next omission is the wages of the watchman, 28 days, at $3.30, amounting to $92.40. The next omission is for stereotyping 825 pages, at $1 per page, $825. If we collect together all the items of cost, they will stand thus:

Pay-roll for RECORD-room	$6,490 05
Pay-roll for press-room	827 47
Pay-roll for folding-room	1,062 58
Clerk at Senate post-office	69 00
Paper for 966 copies daily to Congress	607 08
Paper for 1,292 copies daily to subscribers	835 28
Gas bill for RECORD-room	293 10
Gas bill for press and folding rooms	76 36
Watchman, 28 days at $3.30	92 40
Stereotyping 825 pages at $1	825 00
Actual expense incurred	11,181 32
Cost under estimate	10,863 28
Difference	318 04

So instead of the service already performed by him during the month of February being 20 per cent. below the estimate, it is actually above the estimate, and this showing is more favorable for the Congressional Printer than any which can be made, because the only item in his estimates that is sufficient to cover the cost is that of type-setting, and this is included in the above statement. By this statement it appears that the type-setting did not cost so much as the estimates within about $1,800, while there was a deficiency on the others of something over $2,100; and when we come to the bound edition every single item is largely underestimated. The service connected with the daily is considerably less than that belonging to the regular number on the bound edition; therefore when the entire service is considered the deficiency in the estimates comes to be large. The estimate for the bound edition was about 10 cents per 100 pages, and I now propose to show you that the cost is not less than 15 cents for that quantity of work, or 50 per cent. more than it was estimated would be the cost. In the first place, the only service that is rendered upon the daily and not upon the bound edition is that of stitching; there is the same amount of paper required, there is the same quantity of press-work, and the folding and gathering must be done the same for one as the other. But there are elements of cost upon the book edition which do not enter into the daily, such as dry-pressing, stereotyping, printing on finer paper and at a slower rate of speed. These items more than overbalance the cost of stitching, so that the cost of the book edition cannot by any possibility be less than that of the daily, and the probabilities are that it will be more.

Now the Congressional Printer charges 17 cents per 100 pages for the daily RECORD to subscribers, and this rate is fixed upon under the authority of the law which allows public documents to be sold for the cost of paper and press-work and 10 per cent. thereon. This rate, therefore, is to be taken as his acknowledgment of the actual cost and 10 per cent. added, from which, by a simple arithmetical calculation, the cost is ascertained to be 15.5 cents per 100 pages. This point was examined very closely by the committee during the investigation, and the testimony of the Congressional Printer fully corroborated the figures above named. At first he prevaricated as he did upon almost everything else. He said this rate was intended to apply to the daily and not to the bound edition. The chairman then said:

Question. Do I then understand you that the cost of the daily and bound volumes, where composition is included, would be above the 15.5 cents?
Answer. No, sir.
Q. Would it vary essentially?
A. It would be below that somewhat, I think.

By Mr. HALE:

Q. Are you not wrong? You would have to add to that the cost of composition?
A. O, yes; it would cost more; that is for the first composition. This is the estimated cost of press-work and paper.
Q. The 17 cents per 100 pages?
A. Yes, sir; that is the estimated cost of extra copies for the press-work and paper.

Then at the bottom of the same page, (27,) but on the following day, the Congressional Printer endeavored to explain again, that this rate was fixed upon with reference to the daily edition only, and could not apply to the bound edition. The committee, it appears from the testimony, could not understand how it made any difference what it was intended to apply to; if it was the cost that was all there was to the question, whether the purpose was to apply it to the one or the other. After some cross-questioning by the chairman, as will be seen by reference to pages 28 and 29, the Congressional Printer finally replied that this rate was as near the cost as could be approximated, and the committee took this as his answer in reference to the cost.

Now, I wish to call your attention to the February statement, before referred to, and will show you from it that the rate is not high enough to cover the actual cost. The Congressional Printer says the number of copies printed was 2,258, each containing 868 pages. This gives an aggregate number of 1,959,944 pages. The cost of producing this quantity of work is as follows:

Pay-roll in press-room	$827 47
Pay-roll in folding-room	1,062 58
Paper for 966 copies to Congress	607 08
Paper for 1,292 copies to subscribers	835 28
Clerk at Senate Post-Office	69 00
Watchman, 28 days, at $3.30	92 40
Gas bill in press and folding-rooms	76 36
Cost of 1,959,944 pages	3,570 17

Cost per 100 pages 17¾ cents.
Cost, and 10 per cent. added, 19½ cents.

This calculation does not make any allowance for any of the many contingent items of expense, nor for wear and tear of type and interest on capital; so it must be perfectly apparent to any one who desires to reach the truth that instead of 15.5 cents being too high it is too low. But suppose we accept that as the cost, and apply it to the full number of copies of the book edition now contemplated, namely, about 10,400, of 5,714 pages each, we shall find that the cost of executing that quantity of work under the present arrangement will be $160,224.03; while by the proposition of Messrs. Rives & Bailey they offer to perform this service for $148,564, making a saving to the Government of $11,660 on a single long session on the printing; and on the binding of the book edition their proposition is about 12 cents per volume below the cost at the Public Printing Office. This would save to the Government about $9,000 in a single long session, or a little more than $20,000 on printing and binding together. These figures challenge the closest scrutiny, for they are strictly correct.

Here then is an opportunity for us to save about $30,000 in the two sessions of Congress on the printing and binding of our debates, and at the same time to deal justly and fairly with an enterprising firm that has for many years served us justly and fairly.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE RESOURCES OF THE COUNTRY.

[Mr. BIERY addressed the House on the bill (H. R. No. 1246) to establish at the seat of Government a department of manufactures and mining, and for other purposes, and the substitute therefor reported by the Committee on Manufactures. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. RAPIER. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped there would be no protracted discussion on the civil-rights bill. It has been debated all over the country for the last seven years; twice it has done duty in our national political campaigns; and in every minor election during that time it has been pressed into service for the purpose of intimidating the weak white men who are inclined to support the republican ticket. I was certain until now that most persons were acquainted with its provisions, that they understood its meaning; therefore it was no longer to them the monster it had been depicted, that was to break down all social barriers, and compel one man to recognize another socially, whether agreeable to him or not.

I must confess it is somewhat embarrassing for a colored man to urge the passage of this bill, because if he exhibit an earnestness in the matter and express a desire for its immediate passage, straightway he is charged with a desire for social equality, as explained by the demagogue and understood by the ignorant white man. But then it is just as embarrassing for him not to do so, for, if he remain silent while the struggle is being carried on around, and for him, he is liable to be charged with a want of interest in a matter that concerns him more than any one else, which is enough to make his friends desert his cause. So in steering away from Scylla I may run upon Charybdis. But the anomalous, and I may add the supremely ridiculous, position of the negro at this time, in this country, compel me to say something. Here his condition is without a comparison, parallel alone to itself. Just think that the law recognizes my right upon this floor as a law-maker, but that there is no law to secure to me any accommodations whatever while traveling here to discharge my duties as a Representative of a large and wealthy constituency. Here I am the peer of the proudest, but on a steamboat or car I am not equal to the most degraded. Is not this most anomalous and ridiculous?

What little I shall say will be more in the way of stating the case than otherwise, for I am certain I can add nothing to the arguments already made in behalf of the bill. If in the course of my remarks I should use language that may be considered inelegant, I have only to say that it shall be as elegant as that used by the opposition in discussing this measure; if undignified, it shall not be more so than my subject; if ridiculous, I enter the plea that the example has been set by the democratic side of the House, which claims the right to set examples. I wish to say in justice to myself that no one regrets more than I do the necessity that compels one to the manner born to come in these Halls with hat in hand (so to speak) to ask at the hands of his political peers the same public rights they enjoy. And I shall feel ashamed for my country if there be any foreigners present, who have been lured to our shores by the popular but untruthful declaration that this land is the asylum of the oppressed, to hear a member of the highest legislative body in the world declare from his place, upon his responsibility as a Representative, that notwithstanding his political position he has no civil rights that another class is bound to respect. Here a foreigner can learn what he cannot learn in any other country, that it is possible for a man to be half free and half slave, or, in other words, he will see that it is possible for a man to enjoy political rights while he is denied civil ones; here he will see a man legislating for a free people, while his own chains of civil slavery hang about him, and are far more galling than any the foreigner left behind him; here will see what is not to be seen elsewhere, that position is no mantle of protection in our "land of the free and home of the brave;" for I am subjected to far more outrages and indignities in coming to and going from this capital in discharge of my public duties than any criminal in the country providing he be white. Instead of my position shielding me from insult, it too often invites it.

Let me cite a case. Not many months ago Mr. Cardoza, treasurer of the State of South Carolina, was on his way home from the West. His route lay through Atlanta. There he made request for a sleeping-berth. Not only was he refused this, but was denied a seat in a first-class carriage, and the parties went so far as to threaten to take his life because he insisted upon his rights as a traveler. He was compelled, a most elegant and accomplished gentleman, to take a seat in a dirty smoking-car, along with the traveling rabble, or else be left, to the detriment of his public duties.

I affirm, without the fear of contradiction, that any white ex-convict (I care not what may have been his crime, nor whether the hair on the shaven side of his head has had time to grow out or not) may start with me to-day to Montgomery, that all the way down he will be treated as a gentleman, while I will be treated as the convict. He will be allowed a berth in a sleeping-car with all its comforts, while I will be forced into a dirty, rough box with the drunkards, apple-sellers, railroad hands, and next to any dead that may be in transit, regardless of how far decomposition may have progressed. Sentinels are placed at the doors of the better coaches, with positive instructions to keep persons of color out; and I must do them the justice to say that they guard these sacred portals with a vigilance that would have done credit to the flaming swords at the gates of Eden. Tender, pure, intelligent young ladies are forced to travel in this way if they are guilty of the crime of color, the only unpardonable sin known in our Christian and Bible lands, where sinning against the Holy Ghost (whatever that may be) sinks into insignificance when compared with the sin of color. If from any cause we are compelled to lay over, the best bed in the hotel is his if he can pay for it, while I am invariably turned away, hungry and cold, to stand around the railway station until the departure of the next train, it matters not how long, thereby endangering my health, while my life and property are at the mercy of any highwayman who may wish to murder and rob me.

And I state without the fear of being gainsaid, the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee to the contrary notwithstanding, that there is not an inn between Washington and Montgomery, a distance of more than a thousand miles, that will accommodate me to a bed or meal. Now, then, is there a man upon this floor who is so heartless, whose breast is so void of the better feelings, as to say that this brutal custom needs no regulation? I hold that it does and that Congress is the body to regulate it. Authority for its action is found not only in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, but by virtue of that amendment (which makes all persons born here citizens,) authority is found in article 4, section 2 of the Federal Constitution, which declares in positive language "that the citizens of each State shall have the same rights as the citizens of the several States." Let me read Mr. Brightly's comment upon this clause; he is considered good authority, I believe. In describing the several rights he says they may be all comprehended under the following general heads: "Protection by the Government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety; the right of a citizen of one State to pass through or to reside in any other State for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise."

It is very clear that the right of locomotion without hinderance and everything pertaining thereto is embraced in this clause; and every lawyer knows if any white man in ante bellum times had been refused first-class passage in a steamboat or car, who was free from any contagious disease, and was compelled to go on deck of a boat or into a baggage-car, and any accident had happened to him while he occupied that place, a lawsuit would have followed and damages would have been given by any jury to the plaintiff; and whether any accident had happened or not in the case I have referred to, a suit would have been brought for a denial of rights, and no one doubts what would have been the verdict. White men had rights then that common carriers were compelled to respect, and I demand the same for the colored men now.

Mr. Speaker, whether this deduction from the clause of the Constitution just read was applicable to the negro prior to the adoption of the several late amendments to our organic law is not now a question, but that it does apply to him in his new relations no intelligent man will dispute. Therefore I come to the national, instead of going to the local Legislatures for relief, as has been suggested, because the grievance is national and not local; because Congress is the law-making power of the General Government, whose duty it is to see that there be no unjust and odious discriminations made between its citizens. I look to the Government in the place of the several States, because it claims my first allegiance, exacts at my hands strict obedience to its laws, and because it promises in the implied contract between every citizen and the Government to protect my life and property. I have fulfilled my part of the contract to the extent I have been called upon, and I demand that the Government, through Congress do likewise. Every day my life and property are exposed, are left to the mercy of others, and will be so as long as every hotel-keeper, railroad conductor, and steamboat captain can refuse me with impunity the accommodations common to other travelers. I hold further, if the Government cannot secure to a citizen his guaranteed rights it ought not to call upon him to perform the same duties that are performed by another class of citizens who are in the free and full enjoyment of every civil and political right.

Sir, I submit that I am degraded as long as I am denied the public privileges common to other men, and that the members of this House are correspondingly degraded by recognizing my political equality while I occupy such a humiliating position. What a singular attitude for law-makers of this great nation to assume, rather come down to me than allow me to go up to them. Sir, did you ever reflect that this is the only Christian country where poor, finite man is held responsible for the crimes of the infinite God whom you profess to worship? But it is; I am held to answer for the crime of color, when I was not consulted in the matter. Had I been consulted, and my future fully described, I think I should have objected to being born in this gospel land. The excuse offered for all this inhuman treatment is that they consider the negro inferior to the white man, intellectually and morally. This reason might have been offered and probably accepted as truth some years ago, but no one now believes him incapable of a high order of culture, except some one who is himself below the average of mankind in natural endowments. This is not the reason as I shall show before I have done.

Sir, there is a cowardly propensity in the human heart that delights in oppressing somebody else, and in the gratification of this base desire we always select a victim that can be outraged with safety. As a general thing the Jew has been the subject in most parts of the world; but here the negro is the most available for this purpose; for this reason in part he was seized upon, and not because he is naturally inferior to any one else. Instead of his enemies believing him to be incapable of a high order of mental culture, they have shown that they believe the reverse to be true, by taking the most elaborate pains to prevent his development. And the smaller the caliber of the white man the more frantically has he fought to prevent the intellectual and moral progress of the negro, for the simple but good reason that he has most to fear from such a result. He does not wish to see the negro approach the high moral standard of a man and gentleman.

Let me call your attention to a case in point. Some time since a well-dressed colored man was traveling from Augusta to Montgomery. The train on which he was stopped at a dinner-house. The crowd around the depot seeing him well dressed, fine-looking, and polite, concluded he must be a gentleman, (which was more than their righteous souls could stand,) and straightway they commenced to abuse him. And, sir, he had to go into the baggage-car, open his trunks, show his cards, faro-bank, dice, &c., before they would give him any peace; or, in other words, he was forced to give satisfactory evidence that he was not a man who was working to elevate the moral and intellectual standard of the negro before they would respect him. I have always found more prejudice existing in the breasts of men who have feeble minds and are conscious of it, than in the breasts of those who have towering intellects and are aware of it. Henry Ward Beecher reflected the feelings of the latter class when on a certain occasion he said: "Turn the negro loose; I am not afraid to run the race of life with him." He could afford to say this, all white men cannot; but what does the other class say? "Build a Chinese wall between the negro and the school-house, discourage in him pride of character and honest ambition, cut him off from every avenue that leads to the higher grounds of intelligence and usefulness, and then challenge him to a contest upon the highway of life to decide the question of superiority of race." By their acts, not by their words, the civilized world can and will judge how honest my opponents are in their declarations that I am naturally inferior to them. No one is surprised that this class opposes the passage of the civil-rights bill, for if the negro were allowed the same opportunities, the same rights of locomotion, the same rights to comfort in travel, how could they prove themselves better than the negro?

Mr. Speaker, it was said, I believe by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] that the people of the South, particularly his State, were willing to accord the colored man all the rights they believe him guaranteed by the Constitution. No one doubts this assertion. But the difficulty is they do not acknowledge that I am entitled to any rights under the organic law. I am forced to this conclusion by reading the platforms of the democratic party in the several States. Which one declares that that party believes in the constitutionality of the Reconstruction Acts or the several amendments? But upon the other hand, they question the constitutionality of every measure that is advanced to ameliorate the condition of the colored man; and so skeptical have the democracy become respecting the Constitution, brought about by their unsuccessful efforts to find constitutional objections to every step that is taken to elevate the negro, that now they begin to doubt the constitutionality of the Constitution itself. The most they have agreed to do, is to obey present laws bearing on manhood suffrage until they are repealed by Congress or decided to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

Let me read what the platform of the democratic party in Alabama has to say on this point:

> The democratic and conservative party of the State of Alabama, in entering upon the contest for the redemption of the State government from the radical usurpers who now control it, adopt and declare as their platform—
> 1. That we stand ready to obey the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, and the constitution and laws of the State of Alabama, so long as they remain in force and unrepealed.

I will, however, take the gentleman at his word; but must be allowed to ask if so why was it, even after the several amendments had been officially announced to be part of the Federal Constitution, that his State and others refused to allow the negro to testify in their courts against a white man? If they believed he should be educated (and surely this is a right) why was it that his school-houses were burned down, and the teachers who had gone down on errands of mercy to carry light into dark places driven off, and in some places killed? If they believe the negro should vote, (another right, as I understand the Constitution,) why was it that Ku-Klux Klans were organized to prevent him from exercising the right of an American citizen, namely, casting the ballot—the very thing they said he had a right to do?

The professed belief and practice are sadly at variance, and must be intelligently harmonized before I can be made to believe that they are willing to acknowledge that I have any rights under the Constitution or elsewhere. He boasts of the magnanimity of Kentucky in allowing the negro to vote without qualification, while to enjoy the same privilege in Massachusetts he is required to read the constitution of that State. He was very unhappy in this comparison. Why, sir, his State does not allow the negro to vote at all. When was the constitution of Kentucky amended so as to grant him the elective franchise? They vote there by virtue of the fifteenth amendment alone, independent of the laws and constitution of that Commonwealth; and they would to-day disfranchise him if it could be done without affecting her white population. The Old Bay State waited for no "act of Congress" to force her to do justice to all of her citizens, but in ante bellum days provided in her constitution that all male persons who could read and write should be entitled to suffrage. That was a case of equality before the law, and who had a right to complain? There is nothing now in the amended Federal Constitution to prevent Kentucky from adopting the same kind of clause in her constitution, when the convention meets to revise the organic law of that State, I venture the assertion that you will never hear a word about it; but it will not be out of any regard for her colored citizens, but the respect for that army of fifty-thousand ignorant white men she has within her borders, many of whom I see every time I pass through that State, standing around the several depots continually harping on the stereotyped phrase, "The damned negro won't work."

I would not be surprised though if she should do better in the future. I remember when a foreigner was just as unpopular in Kentucky as the negro is now; when the majority of the people of that State were opposed to according the foreigner the same rights they claimed for themselves; when that class of people were mobbed in the streets of her principal cities on account of their political faith, just as they have done the negro for the last seven years. But what do you see to-day? One of that then proscribed class is Kentucky's chief Representative upon this floor. Is not this an evidence of a returning sense of justice? If so, would it not be reasonable to predict that she will in the near future send one of her now proscribed class to aid him in representing her interests upon this floor?

Mr. Speaker, there is another member of this body who has opposed the passage of this bill very earnestly, whose position in the country and peculiar relations to the Government compel me to refer to him before I conclude. I allude to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.] He returns to this House after an absence of many years with the same old ideas respecting State-rights that he carried away with him. He has not advanced a step; but unfortunately for him the American people have, and no longer consider him a fit expounder of our organic law. Following to its legitimate conclusion the doctrine of State-rights, (which of itself is secession,) he deserted the flag of his country, followed his State out of the Union, and a long and bloody war followed. With its results most men are acquainted and recognize; but he, Bourbon-like, comes back saying the very same things he used to say, and swearing by the same gods he swore by in other days. He seems not to know that the ideas which he so ably advanced for so many years were by the war swept away, along with that system of slavery which he intended should be the chief corner-stone, precious and elect, of the transitory kingdom over which he was second ruler.

Sir, the most of us have seen the play of Rip Van Winkle, who was said to have slept twenty years in the Katskill Mountains. On his return he found that the small trees had grown up to be large ones; the village of Falling Waters had improved beyond his recollection; the little children that used to play around his knees and ride into the village upon his back had grown up to be men and women and assumed the responsibilities of life; most of his friends, including Nick Vedder, had gone to that bourn whence no traveler returns; but, saddest of all, his child, "Mene," could not remember him. No one can see him in his efforts to recall the scenes of other days without being moved almost to tears. This, however, is fiction. The life and actions of the gentleman from Georgia most happily illustrate this character. This is a case where truth is stranger than fiction; and when he comes into these Halls advocating the same old ideas after an absence of so many years, during which time we have had a conflict of arms such as the world never saw, that revolutionized the entire body-politic, he stamps himself a living "Rip Van Winkle."

I reiterate, that the principles of "State-rights," for the recognition of which, he now contends, are the ones that were in controversy during our late civil strife. The arguments pro and con were heard in the roar of battle, amid the shrieks of the wounded, and the groans of the dying; and the decision was rendered amid shouts of victory by the Union soldiers. With it all appear to be familiar except him, and for his information I will state that upon this question an appeal was taken from the forum to the sword, the highest tribunal known to man, that it was then and there decided that National rights are paramount to State-rights, and that liberty and equality before the law should be coextensive with the jurisdiction of the Stars and Stripes. And I will further inform him that the bill now pending is simply to give practical effect to that decision.

I sympathize with him in his inability to understand this great change. When he left here the negro was a chattel, exposed for sale in the market places within a stone's throw of the Capitol; so near that the shadow of the Goddess of Liberty reflected by the rising sun would fall within the slave-pen as a forcible reminder that there was no hopeful day, nothing bright in the future, for the poor slave. Then no negro was allowed to enter these Halls and hear discussions on subjects that most interested him. The words of lofty cheer that fell from the lips of Wade, Giddings, Julian, and others were not allowed to fall upon his ear. Then, not more than three negroes were allowed to assemble at any place in the capital of the nation without special permission from the city authorities. But on his return he finds that the slave-pens have been torn down, and upon their ruins temples of learning have been erected; he finds that the Goddess of Liberty is no longer compelled to cover her radiant face while she weeps for our national shame, but looks with pride and satisfaction upon a free and regenerated land; he finds that the laws and regulations respecting the assembling of negroes are no longer in force, but on the contrary he can see on any public holiday the Butler Zouaves, a fine-looking company of colored men, on parade.

Imagine, if you can, what would have been the effect of such a sight in this city twelve years ago. Then one negro soldier would have caused utter consternation. Congress would have adjourned; the Cabinet would have sought protection elsewhere; the President would have declared martial law; troops and marines would have been ordered out; and I cannot tell all that would have happened; but now such a sight does not excite a ripple on the current of affairs; but over all, and worse to him than all, he finds the negro here, not only a listener but a participant in debate. While I sympathize with him in his inability to comprehend this marvelous change, I must say in all earnestness that one who cannot understand and adjust himself to the new order of things is poorly qualified to teach this nation the meaning of our amended Constitution. The tenacity with which he sticks to his purpose through all the vicissitudes of life is commendable, though his views be objectionable.

While the chief of the late confederacy is away in Europe fleeing the wrath to come in the shape of Joe Johnston's history of the war, his lieutenant, with a boldness that must challenge the admiration of the most impudent, comes into these Halls and seeks to commit the nation through Congress to the doctrine of State-rights, and thus save it from the general wreck that followed the collapse of the rebellion. He had no other business here. Read his speech on the pending bill; his argument was cunning, far more ingenious than ingenuous. He does not deny the need or justness of the measure, but claims that the several States have exclusive jurisdiction of the same. I am not so willing as some others to believe in the sincerity of his assertions concerning the rights of the colored man. If he were honest in this matter, why is it he never recommended such a measure to the Georgia Legislature? If the several States had secured to all classes within their borders the rights contemplated in this bill, we would have had no need to come here; but they having failed to do their duty, after having had ample opportunity, the General Government is called upon to exercise its right in the matter.

Mr. Speaker, time will not allow me to review the history of the American negro, but I must pause here long enough to say that he has not been properly treated by this nation; he has purchased and paid for all, and for more, than he has yet received. Whatever liberty he enjoys has been paid for over and over again by more than two hundred years of forced toil; and for such citizenship as is allowed him he paid the full measure of blood, the dearest price required at the hands of any citizen. In every contest, from the beginning of the revolutionary struggle down to the war between the States, has he been prominent. But we all remember in our late war when the Government was so hard pressed for troops to sustain the cause of the Union, when it was so difficult to fill up the ranks that had been so fearfully decimated by disease and the bullet; when every train that carried to the front a number of fresh soldiers brought back a corresponding number of wounded and sick ones; when grave doubts as to the success of the Union arms had seized upon the minds of some of the most sanguine friends of the Government; when strong men took counsel of their fears; when those who had all their lives received the fostering care of the nation were hesitating as to their duty in that trying hour, and others questioning if it were not better to allow the star of this Republic to go down and thus be blotted out from the great map of nations than to continue the bloodshed; when gloom and despair were wide-spread; when the last ray of hope had nearly sunk below our political horizon, how the negro then came forward and offered himself as a sacrifice in the place of the nation, made bare his breast to the steel, and in it received the thrusts of the bayonet that were aimed at the life of the nation by the soldiers of that government in which the gentleman from Georgia figured as second officer.

Sir, the valor of the colored soldier was tested on many a battle-field, and to-day his bones lie bleaching beside every hill and in every valley from the Potomac to the Gulf; whose mute eloquence in behalf of equal rights for all before the law, is and ought to be far more persuasive than any poor language I can command.

Mr. Speaker, nothing short of a complete acknowledgment of my manhood will satisfy me. I have no compromises to make, and shall unwillingly accept any. If I were to say that I would be content with less than any other member upon this floor I would forfeit whatever respect any one here might entertain for me, and would thereby furnish the best possible evidence that I do not and cannot appreciate the rights of a freeman. Just what I am charged with by my political enemies. I cannot willingly accept anything less than my full measure of rights as a man, because I am unwilling to present myself as a candidate for the brand of inferiority, which will be as plain and lasting as the mark of Cain. If I am to be thus branded, the country must do it against my solemn protest.

Sir, in order that I might know something of the feelings of a freeman, a privilege denied me in the land of my birth, I left home last year and traveled six months in foreign lands, and the moment I put my foot upon the deck of a ship that unfurled a foreign flag from its mast-head, distinctions on account of my color ceased. I am not aware that my presence on board the steamer put her off her course. I believe we made the trip in the usual time. It was in other countries than my own that I was not a stranger, that I could approach a hotel without the fear that the door would be slammed in my face. Sir, I feel this humiliation very keenly; it dwarfs my manhood, and certainly it impairs my usefulness as a citizen.

The other day when the centennial bill was under discussion I would have been glad to say a word in its favor, but how could I? How would I appear at the centennial celebration of our national freedom, with my own galling chains of slavery hanging about me? I could no more rejoice on that occasion in my present condition than the Jews could sing in their wonted style as they sat as captives beside the Babylonish streams; but I look forward to the day when I shall be in the full enjoyment of the rights of a freeman, with the same hope they indulged, that they would again return to their native land. I can no more forget my manhood, than they could forget Jerusalem.

After all, this question resolves itself to this: either I am a man or I am not a man. If one, I am entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities common to any other class in this country; if not a man, I have no right to vote, no right to a seat here; if no right to vote, then 20 per cent. of the members on this floor have no right here, but, on the contrary, hold their seats in violation of law. If the negro has no right to vote, then one-eighth of your Senate consists of members who have no shadow of a claim to the places they occupy; and if no right to a vote, a half-dozen governors in the South figure as usurpers.

This is the legitimate conclusion of the argument, that the negro is not a man and is not entitled to all the public rights common to other men, and you cannot escape it. But when I press my claims I am asked, "Is it good policy?" My answer is, "Policy is out of the question; it has nothing to do with it; that you can have no policy in dealing with your citizens; that there must be one law for all; that in this case justice is the only standard to be used, and you can no more divide justice than you can divide Deity." On the other hand, I am told that I must respect the prejudices of others. Now, sir, no one respects reasonable and intelligent prejudices more than I. I respect religious prejudices, for example; these I can comprehend. But how can I have respect for the prejudices that prompt a man to turn up his nose at the males of a certain race, while at the same time he has a fondness for the females of the same race to the extent of cohabitation? Out of four poor unfortunate colored women who from poverty were forced to go to the lying-in branch of the Freedmen's Hospital here in the District last year three gave birth to children whose fathers were white men, and I venture to say that if they were members of this body, would vote against the civil-rights bill. Do you, can you wonder at my want of respect for this kind of prejudice? To make me feel uncomfortable appears to be the highest ambition of many white men. It is to them a positive luxury, which they seek to indulge at every opportunity.

I have never sought to compel any one, white or black to associate with me, and never shall; nor do I wish to be compelled to associate with any one. If a man do not wish to ride with me in the street-car I shall not object to his hiring a private conveyance; if he do not wish to ride with me from here to Baltimore, who shall complain if he charter a special train? For a man to carry out his prejudices in this way would be manly, and would leave no cause for complaint, but to crowd me out of the usual conveyance into an uncomfortable place with persons for whose manners I have a dislike, whose language is not fit for ears polite, is decidedly unmanly and cannot be submitted to tamely by any one who has a particle of self-respect.

Sir, this whole thing grows out of a desire to establish a system of "caste," an anti-republican principle, in our free country. In Europe they have princes, dukes, lords, &c., in contradistinction to the middle classes and peasants. Further East they have the brahmans or priests, who rank above the sudras or laborers. In those countries distinctions are based upon blood and position. Every one there understands the custom and no one complains. They, poor innocent creatures, pity our condition, look down upon us with a kind of royal compassion, because they think we have no tangible lines of distinction, and therefore speak of our society as being vulgar. But let not our friends beyond the seas lay the flattering unction to their souls that we are without distinctive lines; that we have no nobility; for we are blessed with both. Our distinction is color, (which would necessarily exclude the brahmans,) and our lines are much broader than anything they know of. Here a drunken white man is not only equal to a drunken negro, (as would be the case anywhere else,) but superior to the most sober and orderly one; here an ignorant white man is not only the equal of an unlettered negro, but is superior to the most cultivated; here our nobility cohabit with our female peasants, and then throw up their hands in holy horror when a male of the same class enters a restaurant to get a meal, and if he insist upon being accommodated our scion of royalty will leave and go to the arms of his colored mistress and there pour out his soul's complaint, tell her of the impudence of the "damned nigger" in coming to a table where a white man was sitting.

What poor, simple-minded creatures these foreigners are. They labor under the delusion that they monopolize the knowledge of the courtesies due from one gentleman to another. How I rejoice to know that it is a delusion. Sir, I wish some of them could have been present to hear the representative of the F. F. V.'s upon this floor (and I am told that that is the highest degree that society has yet reached in this country) address one of his peers, who dared asked him a question, in this style: "I am talking to white men." Suppose Mr. Gladstone—who knows no man but by merit—who in violation of our custom entertained the colored jubilee singers at his home last summer, or the Duke de Broglie, had been present and heard this eloquent remark drop from the lips of this classical and knightly member, would they not have hung their heads in shame at their ignorance of politeness, and would they not have returned home, repaired to their libraries, and betaken themselves to the study of Chesterfield on manners? With all these absurdities staring them in the face, who can wonder that foreigners laugh at our ideas of distinction?

Mr. Speaker, though there is not a line in this bill the democracy approve of, yet they made the most noise about the school clause. Dispatches are freely sent over the wires as to what will be done with the common-school system in the several Southern States in the event this bill becomes a law. I am not surprised at this, but, on the other hand, I looked for it. Now what is the force of that school clause? It simply provides that all the children in every State where there is a school system supported in whole or in part by general taxation shall have equal advantages of school privileges. So that if perfect and ample accommodations are not made convenient for all the children, then any child has the right to go to any school where they do exist. And that is all there is in this school clause. I want some one to tell me of any measure that was intended to benefit the negro that they have approved of. Of which one did they fail to predict evil? They declared if the negroes were emancipated that the country would be laid waste, and that in the end he would starve, because he could not take care of himself. But this was a mistake. When the reconstruction acts were passed and the colored men in my State were called upon to express through the ballot whether Alabama should return to the Union or not, white men threw up their hands in holy horror and declared if the negro voted that never again would they deposit another ballot. But how does the matter stand now? Some of those very men are in the republican ranks, and I have known them to grow hoarse in shouting for our platforms and candidates. They hurrah for our principles with all the enthusiasm of a new-born soul, and, sir, so zealous have they become that in looking at them I am amazed, and am often led to doubt my own faith and feel ashamed for my lukewarmness. And those who have not joined our party are doing their utmost to have the negro vote with them. I have met them in the cabins night and day where they were imploring him for the sake of old times to come up and vote with them.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that political prejudices prompt the democracy to oppose this bill as much as anything else. In the campaign of 1868 Joe Williams, an uncouth and rather notorious colored man, was employed as a general democratic canvasser in the South. He was invited to Montgomery to enlighten us, and while there he stopped at one of the best hotels in the city, one that would not dare entertain me. He was introduced at the meeting by the chairman of the democratic executive committee as a learned and elegant, as well as eloquent gentleman. In North Alabama he was invited to speak at the Seymour and Blair barbecue, and did address one of the largest audiences, composed largely of ladies, that ever assembled in that part of the State. This I can prove by my simon-pure democratic colleague, Mr. SLOSS, for he was chairman of the committee of arrangements on that occasion, and I never saw him so radiant with good humor in all my life as when he had the honor of introducing "his friend," Mr. Williams. In that case they were extending their courtesies to a coarse, vulgar stranger, because he was a democrat, while at the same time they were hunting me down as the partridge on the mount, night and day, with their Ku-Klux Klan, simply because I was a republican and refused to bow at the foot of their Baal. I might enumerate many instances of this kind, but I forbear. But to come down to a later period, the Greeley campaign. The colored men who were employed to canvass North Carolina in the interest of the democratic party were received at all the hotels as other men and treated I am informed with marked distinction. And in the State of Louisiana a very prominent colored gentleman saw proper to espouse the Greeley cause, and when the fight was over and the McEnery government saw fit to send on a committee to Washington to present their case to the President, this colored gentleman was selected as one of that committee. On arriving in the city of New Orleans prior to his departure he was taken to the Saint Charles, the most aristocratic hotel in the South. When they started he occupied a berth in the sleeping-car; at every eating-house he was treated like the rest of them, no distinction whatever. And when they arrived at Montgomery I was at the depot, just starting for New York. Not only did the conductor refuse to allow me a berth in the sleeping-car, but I was also denied a seat in the first-class carriage. Now, what was the difference between us? Nothing but our political faith. To prove this I have only to say that just a few months before this happened, he, along with Frederick Douglass and others, was denied the same privileges he enjoyed in coming here. And now that he has returned to the right party again I can tell him that never more will he ride in another sleeping-car in the South unless this bill become law. There never was a truer saying than that circumstances alter cases.

Mr. Speaker, to call this land the asylum of the oppressed is a misnomer, for upon all sides I am treated as a pariah. I hold that the solution of this whole matter is to enact such laws and prescribe such penalties for their violation as will prevent any person from discriminating against another in public places on account of color. No one asks, no one seeks the passage of a law that will interfere with any one's private affairs. But I do ask the enactment of a law to secure me in the enjoyment of public privileges. But when I ask this I am told that I must wait for public opinion; that it is a matter that cannot be forced by law. While I admit that public opinion is a power, and in many cases is a law of itself, yet I cannot lose sight of the fact that both statute law, and the law of necessity manufacture public opinion. I remember, it was unpopular to enlist negro soldiers in our late war, and after they enlisted it was equally unpopular to have them fight in the same battles; but when it became a necessity in both cases public opinion soon came around to that point. No white father objected to the negro's becoming food for powder if thereby his son could be saved. No white woman objected to the negro marching in the same ranks and fighting in the same battles if by that her husband could escape burial in our savannas and return to her and her little ones.

Suppose there had been no reconstruction acts nor amendments to the Constitution, when would public opinion in the South have suggested the propriety of giving me the ballot? Unaided by law when would public opinion have prompted the Administration to appoint members of my race to represent this Government at foreign courts? It is said by some well-meaning men that the colored man has now every right under the common law; in reply I wish to say that that kind of law commands very little respect when applied to the rights of colored men in my portion of the country; the only law that we have any regard for is uncommon law of the most positive character. And I repeat, if you will place upon your statute-books laws that will protect me in my rights, that public opinion will speedily follow.

Mr. Speaker, I trust this bill will become law, because it is a necessity, and because it will put an end to all legislation on this subject. It does not and cannot contemplate any such idea as social equality; nor is there any man upon this floor so silly as to believe that there can be any law enacted or enforced that would compel one man to recognize another as his equal socially; if there be, he ought not to be here, and I have only to say that they have sent him to the wrong public building. I would oppose such a bill as earnestly as the gentleman from North Carolina, whose associations and cultivations have been of such a nature as to lead him to select the crow as his standard of grandeur and excellence in the place of the eagle, the hero of all birds and our national emblem of pride and power. I will tell him that I have seen many of his race to whose level I should object to being dragged.

Sir, it matters not how much men may differ upon the question of State and national rights; there is one class of rights, however, that we all agree upon, namely, individual rights, which includes the right of every man to select associates for himself and family, and to say who shall and who shall not visit at his house. This right is God-given and custom-sanctioned, and there is, and there can be no power overruling your decision in this matter. Let this bill become law and not only will it do much toward giving rest to this weary country on this subject, completing the manhood of my race and perfecting his citizenship, but it will take him from the political arena as a topic of discussion where he has done duty for the last fifty years, and thus freed from anxiety respecting his political standing, hundreds of us will abandon the political fields who are there from necessity, and not from choice and enter other and more pleasant ones; and thus relieved, it will be the aim of the colored man as well as his duty and interest, to become a good citizen, and to do all in his power to advance the interests of a common country.

Mr. RANSIER. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to my friend for yielding a portion of his time to me, while I am sorry that by doing so he has interrupted himself in his eloquent speech. I had intended, if I had had the opportunity, to say something on this occasion by way of reply to a part of a recent speech by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] and that of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BUTLER.] The few minutes allowed me, however, are not sufficient to enable me even to briefly sketch what I had hoped to be able to say.

The remarks on yesterday of the distinguished Mississippian [Mr. LAMAR] who somewhat electrified the House, and who by the way seems to be somewhat in advance of those for whom he spoke in the matter of a sincere and hearty acquiescence with some of the results of the late war, attracted my attention for more reasons than one. The first was because to many of his utterances importance ought to be attached, coming from the gentleman who spoke. But when he said that the negroes in this country were possessed of all the rights and privileges attaching to other citizens, I cannot admit that he stated what was exactly true. For if that were the fact five millions of people would not be asking the Congress of the United States to-day for the passage of the civil-rights bill. Nor would the dying words of Charles Sumner, addressed to Mr. HOAR, have been uttered, "Do not let the civil-rights bill fail." Nor would the Senate of the United States sit twenty consecutive hours to pass a useless measure. Hence I say that the statement of the distinguished Mississippian that the colored people of this country possessed all the rights attaching to American citizenship, followed up by the imploring appeal that we ought to pay some attention to the rights and interests of the white people of the South, was not exactly true; else we would not be here to-day asking the Congress of the United States to pass the civil-rights bill; nor would we be here to-day reminding the republican party of the country of their solemn obligation to pass such a bill, nor would we be here to remind the republican party to-day that if Congress adjourns without the passage of such a bill, to which it is committed, they will demoralize nine hundred thousand voters in this country and withhold an act of justice from five millions of people. I repeat that the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi is not exactly true, as has already been abundantly proven.

But it is a sign, Mr. Speaker, of the rapid strides of progress we have made as a nation that the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, identified in the manner he is with the past, is now seeking to blot out that past, so far as clinging to its dead issues is concerned. I hail the spirit of his speech as indicative of the progress and advancing strides we are making as a nation. But I say to-day, and I speak, if I can, to the country, that so far as there is an impression that the colored man in this country has obtained all that attaches to American citizenship, or that the passage of the civil-rights bill will work injuriously to either whites or blacks, there never was a greater mistake made. If that were the fact, I say again there never was a more useless or unnecessary imploration uttered than that embodied in the dying words of Charles Sumner, "Take care of the civil-rights bill."

Now, sir, let me say in the brief moment allowed me that what pains me most in this matter is that men coming from the South, from Tennessee and from Virginia, indebted for their elevation to the position of members of Congress on this floor in part at least to colored votes, are to be found declaring that colored men do not want the civil-rights bill. They misrepresent that portion of their constituencies. I say to them, in the language of Charles Sumner to a Senator of the United States, "They are not your constituency; they are mine." You misrepresent them and have added insult to the injury you would inflict.

When the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BUTLER] said that the colored people did not want civil rights, that portion of his constituency almost at that same moment were, in a State convention called for the purpose, engaged in making a protest against the position assumed by Mr. BROWNLOW, of Tennessee, who had written against the bill.

The convention referred to passed the following resolutions:

Whereas the Congress of the United States, by public authority, have made large donations and endowments to many educational institutions, to citizens of the several States of this Union; and whereas Tennessee has received the fund allowed and provided by this supreme authority of our country, and the colored citizens form a large part of the population of the State, and have received none of the benefits of this liberal provision for public improvement; and whereas there is now a bill before the Congress of the United States conferring on the colored citizens civil rights, and as it is our duty as men to arrange means of instruction for the perfect development of posterity, we call the attention of the Congress of the United States to the fact that the public institutions of Tennessee are defective in point of principle and practice, are anti-republican and proscriptive, and their tendency is to breed discord between citizens and stimulate the spirit of caste and hate: Therefore,

Resolved, That we most respectfully ask the passage of the civil-rights bill as introduced by Hon. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, and reported by the Judiciary Committee, containing the provisions of an impartial education afforded to us and our children by the public schools of this country, as the most potent power to develop true republicanism and love of country, good feeling and personal regard mutually.

Resolved, That the institutions endowed by the General Government be so regulated that the colored citizens shall be admitted to them impartially, in proportion to their population, and provision shall be made to carry out the apportionment of this class of citizens; and whereas the common or public schools of the country is the medium through which an education will reach the masses of the citizens, we, as American citizens, demand that we shall enjoy them impartially, that we may encourage protection in a republic where all are equal before the law, and promote a high and useful career for the young upon the enduring basis of a true and consistent republic, which generously showers its blessings upon all alike, regardless of external circumstances or condition.

Resolved, That we will consider the omission of the republican party to enact this measure a baseless surrender of the rights of humanity to our insidious foes, who have contested upon the avenues of civil life every right we enjoy, as they did every right of freedom on the field of battle; and we will do our utmost to stamp upon every demagogue who seeks to betray the privileges of our children to the full enjoyment of impartial and equal privileges in the public schools the brand of the traitor Judas, as deserving politically a traitor's doom, with whom we will never, never join hands nor support, but will regard as our public and private enemy, more terrible to meet than a savage beast, more injurious than any catastrophe that could befall us, or any calamity that could be devised by any wicked unseen power that could reap a carnival of misery; but equal and impartial rights will secure to posterity their just and true relations, order will come from chaos, good will spring up where spite and hate exist, Ethiopia will in this fair country stretch forth her hands to God, peace will prevail, God will bless us, and we will walk hand in hand.

Also the following:

Whereas it has been asserted without authority and unwarrantably that the colored citizens of Tennessee and the South do not want civil rights, with impartial school privileges to all the colored children in the South in the public schools, and all the other privileges demanded and allowed in civil laws: this convention of colored citizens repel indignantly and with contempt the misanthrope who would seek to fasten and fetter with prejudice our children and posterity, and we earnestly invoke the national Congress to pass the civil-rights bill, giving to our children impartial school privileges in every public school, State and national, throughout the United States, and deny to any the privileges of invidious distinctions against our race in any of the institutions of the country; and present our thanks to General BENJAMIN F. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, for his management of the bill in the House of Representatives of the United States, so ably vindicated by the lamented Charles Sumner.

I ask for the passage of the civil-rights bill before we shall adjourn. We ask it as a measure of justice to those people who have been true to the nation and to the party in power. We ask it at the hands of President Grant and the republican party. We ask it too, sir, as a matter of sound public policy in the interest of the republican party and the country. To say that the intelligent colored people are not desiring this measure is, sir, I repeat, adding insult to injury. We ask it; we are not in a position to demand it. We plead for it respectfully, but in no uncertain voice, and confidently look for its early passage.

Mr. Speaker, the condition of affairs in South Carolina, Arkansas, Louisiana, and elsewhere in the South is lugged into these debates here and into the writing of newspaper articles as evidences of the unfitness of the negro for the franchise and for civil rights. Sir, that affairs in some of these States are not in a satisfactory condition is unfortunately true; but, sir, these people have done as well under all the circumstances as any other race similarly situated could have done. They have made mistakes and are alive to the fact, and so far as they are concerned are endeavoring to rectify them. They have been deceived in men whom they elected to fill important positions, as the too-confiding colored people of portions of Tennessee and Virginia and elsewhere have been deceived and are being misrepresented by some of those towards whose election they contributed largely.

As to affairs in my own State, sir, I could wish that there were no grave constitutional obstructions in the way of an investigation into our affairs, as is asked for by a portion of our people. The masses of our people, white and black, would rather invite investigation and a thorough understanding of our affairs than shrink from it. None but those who may be guilty of such practices as are charged against them, and are or may be directly responsible for the misuse of the public moneys and abuses in other directions, could reasonably object. But, sir, because some officials in these States have abused the public confidence and prostituted their office, is violence to be done to a great principle of justice, and a whole race denied therein equal rights in a government like ours? It cannot be, Mr. Speaker. Let justice be done though the heavens fall.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it is probably my duty as a member of the committee reporting the bill called up by my colleague, [Mr. BIERY,] as it is certainly my right under the rules, to add my voice to what has been already so well said this evening in support of it.

The provisions of the substitute recommended by the Committee on Manufactures have been very fully explained by my colleague, who gave many excellent reasons in its favor. The object sought by the committee, to state it as compactly as I am able, is to so enlarge the duties of the Bureau of Statistics as that it shall be required to collect and collate for the use of Congress and the country full information concerning the leading industries of the nation, including the costs and quantities of production, of consumption, and of freights between the different sections of the country; also as to the sources and values of raw material, foreign and domestic, the values of products, the wages paid to workingmen, the cost of food, rents, and clothing, together with such kindred and comparative facts as may be readily obtained from other countries. These statistics are designed to show the operation, the sources of supply, and the places of market of all our great industries, whether of the field, the forest, or the mine, and the tribute which is paid by the people to middle men and common carriers. This, gentlemen will observe, is in the main a field hitherto unoccupied by the statisticians of this country.

The bill for which this is a substitute proposed the organization of a Department of Manufactures and Mines. I am, sir, in favor, as I have once before taken occasion to say in the presence of the House, of the establishment of a Department of Industry with its Bureaus of agriculture, of manufactures, and of mining.

I am in favor of such a Department, because I would have the producing activities of the country, which, next to freedom, lie at the base of our prosperity as a people and our grandeur as a nation, fostered by Government and represented in its executive councils. The committee, however, have seen fit, moved mainly by ideas of present economy, to give to the House this substitute instead, which, until such a Department can be established, as it one day will be, will subserve a purpose of great utility in the same direction.

Sir, I urge the passage of this substitute for three reasons: First, because it will furnish to the laboring, the producing, and the commercial classes information that will aid them to seize opportunity and to give scope to their enterprise. Second, because it will place before the legislators of the thirty-seven States and before the Congress of the nation facts that will guide with a truer index than the maxims or teachings of the mere theorist in the solution of questions of social and political economy that in the near future cannot be avoided. Third, because it will array facts that will serve to demonstrate the capability of our continent for independence from all the world besides in supplying the wants of our forty millions of to-day and of our hundred millions of to-morrow; and more than this, of sending vast surpluses abroad each year to other peoples, whereby we may one day become rich and great as no nation has been rich and great since the world began.

These reasons differ somewhat from those perhaps no less forcible ones presented by my colleague. I hope that I have been so fortunate as to have distinctly stated them.

It is my purpose, if the House will indulge me with its attention, with the thermometer at 93 in the Hall, to speak of these reasons briefly, but in detail, and to answer some objections that may be urged against the bill, and then to give place to a gentleman, not a member of the committee, but whom I am anxious to have heard upon it. This is the only bill which the Committee on Manufactures has reported at this session, and I shall be glad to have it well reviewed in the debates of the House before the vote is taken pursuant to the notice given by my colleague.

It is scarcely necessary, I apprehend, sir, that I pause to amplify upon the first reason which I give for the passage of this bill, to any considerable length at any rate. To do so would certainly be supererogatory were I speaking to men themselves engaged in industrial pursuits. To them the simple statement of what is proposed would be a postulate of its value. Why, sir, it was at the demand of industry that statistical knowledge was first sought. An Englishman, Sir William Petty, who had been president of the board of trade, for the aid of the commerce and production of the kingdom, near the middle of the last century if I remember correctly, first made statistics a science—the science of figures applied to life. Later the same interest, coupled with that of the solution of certain social problems, caused the organization of the first statistical society at Manchester in 1833, which was soon followed by similar organizations upon the continent. The demands of the same interests led to the four international statistical congresses that have been held; the first in Brussels in 1853, and the last, I think, in London in 1860.

The fact that this branch of knowledge sprang from the demands of the business world, and that it has greatly benefited business in all its branches, is, I think, clearly revealed in the histories of British and continental industries, is, it seems to me, a proof indisputable that my first reason for asking the passage of this bill is well assigned. The whys and the wherefores, as I intimated a moment since, would be at once appreciated by men engaged in the industries of the country, whether as employer or employed. The intelligent farmer or manufacturer would at a glance comprehend how a benefit would accrue to him from a knowledge as to the sources of raw material—the sources of supply and the direction of the best demands which give vigor to their several industries in other sections. The laborer, he who has only his toil to sell in any market, would at once see how his interests would be advanced should Government come to him, and, like an elder brother, point to where work may be had, where its burdens are lighter or its rewards greater.

An inestimable advantage would accrue to all classes from a greater diversification of industries which, I believe, accurate statistical knowledge would tend to promote. In the South, where the old myth "cotton is king" still clings to the people like a religion of the fathers, the exclusive trust should no longer remain in a monarch who biennially abdicates before an army of caterpillars. Other less timid interests should be invited in to save the interregnum. In the West agriculture and manufactures should stand together amid the abundance of nature, and all sections should shake hands through a cheaper means of commerce. To promote this information in the direction proposed will be invaluable.

It was once said that "knowledge is power." Nowhere in the range of human experience is this more true than with the laboring and producing classes. The American manufacturer, the American mechanic, the American agriculturist, the workingmen of this country, and the aggregate of these is nineteen-twentieths of our people, under the beneficence of our Government, with its free schools, and imbued with the spirit that seems born of the very air that races over our mountains and plains, are now the most advanced and enterprising people of the globe. The intelligence they have put into the mowers and reapers, into sewing-machines and other products of American genius, have made these things inimitable by other peoples, and has given to them control of the markets of the world. The indomitable perseverance with which they have pushed forward agricultural and horticultural experiment and development has given to their products the very highest place of excellence.

To aid the achievements of this power, to give scope to its ambition, and to add to the sum total of the advantages it now enjoys, it seems to me due that Government should place within its reach the information contemplated by this bill.

I pass now to the second reason. The proposed statistics are necessary as a basis for the statesmanship of the future.

New conditions require new policies. Statesmanship can have no formula that will do for all times. Rousseau said that "the science of government is merely a science of combinations, of applications, and of exceptions, according to time, place, and circumstances." This is true as to the means; the end, which should ever be the highest happiness of the citizen, neither time, place, nor circumstances can change. From this time forward the American statesman must study the means, through this science of figures as applied to life in the present, not through theories alone which time and change may have plundered of the wisdom they once possessed.

I have, I trust, sir, all due respect for the wisdom and usefulness of the books which assume to teach the philosophy of government. But, sir, unless I mistake, it is one of the misfortunes of this Republic that her legislation is molded too much by the scholarly, old-time theories of political economists, who were not of or for us or our age, and too little by the plain, common-sense deductions from the broad facts of history and of existing conditions. The party politician is the chrysalis from which the legislator emerges into public life, and the legislator is too often only a statesman by brevet—if I may so use the term; and I intend no disrespect to gentlemen here—who rushes for guidance through his brief day more often to the libraries where the logic of dead history lies fossilized into theories made often to support political dogmas, between the covers of London-made books, than to the sources of knowledge of actual, living, home facts. By such guidance their acts are as apt to be wrong as the present is apt to differ from the past, or as conditions here are apt to be dissimilar from conditions in other countries. Write this down a truth, that without knowledge of the living facts of the present there can be no wise statesmanship. The ancient Greeks, although heathens, were at one period the wisest political economists the world has ever had. One of the wisest of their thinkers, Polybius, the historian, said:

> A statesman who is ignorant of the way in which events have originated and who cannot tell from what circumstance they have arisen, may be compared to the physician who fails to make himself acquainted with the disease which he is called to cure. They are both useless and worthless.

I hope that I shall not be misunderstood. I would not, sir, by any means, that the writings of old or foreign political economists should be unstudied. Adam Smith, Mill, Ricardo, and the rest each wrote with a profundity of thought before which we bow our heads in respect. Their deductions are of high consequence, but are dangerous unless read with the memory that they wrote for other times, for other social conditions, and often to bolster up theories that shock our modern American idea of the true object of governments.

The man who is honored by the people with a seat in this Hall, to represent their interest, is dangerous to those who sent him if he studies not the statistics of his own country, or if he refuses to quit the high plane of political speculation upon which these authors have placed him to consult the wants and the views of the agriculturists, the manufacturers, the laborers, the men of business of his district, as to the matters of legislation that concern them. Experience has proven how dangerous such men are, or I have read our history to no purpose. Let me instance a single passage to verify my remark. From 1846 to 1861 a feature of the Adam Smith philosophy shaped our national legislation. From 1861 down to the year of grace in which we live a common-sense, though home-made, philosophy has in general held sway. During the period first named industry languished; prosperity was at a stand still—hard times was rapping with bony knuckles at every door. In the latter period prosperity made gigantic strides forward—activity and abundance were everywhere. What was the cause of this contrast? The seasons came and went with their light and their shadow, their storms and their calms, in both periods alike. The rain and the sunshine, like all that comes from above, were impartial. The earth bore fruits and the mine offered its treasures the same in all these years. What then occasioned this wide difference in our prosperity, which was a part of the experience of every gentleman here, and which you will all say I have stated with feebleness? It was, sir, because in the one period our young industries were made to carry the burden of cheap-labor competition, which crushed them out, and, in the other that burden was removed by a tariff equal to the difference between Old and New World wages. Do gentlemen insist that this later policy is unjust to the consumer, when it was the wages of this same consumer, directly or indirectly, that made this burden death to our manufactures, and when the sequel has proved that home manufacture cheapens prices?

It was, sir, the seeming wisdom of Smith and Ricardo as against the real wisdom of a Kelley, a Dawes, a Blaine, a Schenck, and a host of such men, whom the fortunes of politics had placed in this Hall. It was this that made the contrast. No thoughtful student of our history will deny it.

This item of our experience ought to teach us somewhat.

Experience, joined with common sense,
To mortals is a providence.

It should bear fruits of practical wisdom to be plucked by us and by those that come after us, until we reach that condition—a state of advanced industries—which those Old World political economists must have had in mind when they wrote their theories.

When the eccentric philosopher who once sat at the desk of the New York Tribune, clothed with a power which a king might envy, for whose memory Americans will ever cherish a veneration, and whose niche in the temple of fame is hewn side by side with that of Benjamin Franklin, and this, too, notwithstanding the differing views entertained of the conspicuous acts of the last year of his useful life—when, I say, this American political economist, who knew more facts of this science than any contemporary, turned the glare of his homely lantern upon these imported theories, in which American students and American readers of semi-American newspapers are indoctrinated, their perniciousness under the situation of our manufacturing and agricultural industries was revealed so plainly that no one but the blinded by self-interest or false education could fail to see it. For the dead level of things, in which population, resource, production, skill, and wealth are pretty evenly distributed among peoples, these theories are undoubtedly best for all. But to a people treading the up-hill of prosperity they are, it seems to me, very unwise. The time may soon come when we should adjust them. That time is not yet.

I voted the other day in opposition to many of my party friends, and with the minority of the House, against restoring the tax on incomes. I did so because I believed that in case an increase of taxation should become necessary to meet deficits in the Treasury more tariff would be preferable. If taxation must come let it come in such shape that it will bring compensation with it in the increased rewards of industry. Were it not for two things I should favor direct taxation upon the wealth of the land, with liberal exemptions for the poorer of our people, as a means of raising revenue. These two things are, first, that a tariff judiciously adjusted builds up home industry; and second, that its burden is voluntary, and so but little felt. This is certainly better than to restore the tax on incomes, which experience has proved to be an unwholesome check upon enterprise, and altogether odious to the people.

My judgment, sir, of a judicious adjustment of the tariff is this: First, a high tariff upon all commodities that are or can be produced here, or of which we produce articles that will in every respect serve the same purpose. Second, a tariff placed at that point where the utmost revenue will be realized upon articles of luxury, fashion, and fancy that are not produced here. Third, place upon the free list all necessaries of life which we do not produce. This would build up all our industries, would increase the rewards of labor, would make the expenditures of the rich pay the expenses of Government, and would give cheap necessaries to our people. This duty should be no respecter of persons or pursuits, and should, in my judgment, be ad valorem as far as the honest collection of the revenues will permit.

Sir, the consideration of the influence of the proposed statistics upon the statesmanship of the future has led me, logically enough, to speak of the tariff question. If it were in the line of thought which this bill opens to enter upon a discussion of that question further than to state the effect which I believe these facts would have upon it, as it is not, I would quote the words of Washington in his second annual message, of Jefferson, of Jackson, and of his immortal compeer Henry Clay, and of a host of others of our fathers and statesmen who spoke from the dictates of an observant wisdom in favor of tariff laws. I should likewise attempt to show the reasons, which are to me clear as noonday sunlight, upon which such laws are based. But, sir, the line of my argument does not lie to such a distance in this direction.

Much has come to our ears since the beginning of the session of the general depression of business throughout the country, and much discussion has been had as to the relief demanded by the people and as to the ways and means required by a depleted Treasury. The patient has had too many doctors, who have been so busy in disagreeing that they had no time to unite on a measure of relief. In the language of the Persian proverb, "The mill grinds, but there is no meal." You have, however, with commendable zeal, for which I am sure the country will give you credit, cut down expenditures as never before, and you have framed your tax bill, which a day or two ago passed the House, in some items at least greatly in the interests of prosperity. I instance the restoration of the duty of six dollars a ton on jute-butts, which, should it become law by the concurrence of the Senate and the Executive, will help the farmers of the country by making flax culture once more a source of profit.

You have done this and some other things in the same direction, but you have not done that which would of itself restore from the prostration. Encourage the industries, agricultural and manufacturing, by a tariff adjusted upon the principles of which I spoke a moment ago; give the people a sound, sufficient, uniform currency, secured by the wealth of the nation and emancipated from the control of Shylocks and monopolies, a currency which will possess both elasticity of volume, and a permanency of value, upon which the people may rely from year to year, keeping withal faith wherever pledged and making no pledges to be broken. Do this, and you will have started the nation and the people out upon the high road to a prosperity which, as surely as the years abide, will pay off in good time the national debt, will make our currency as good as gold for all the purposes of a medium of exchange and convertible into it dollar for dollar, and that will lift the nation and the people up into the mountain-heights of a grand prosperity, above the cloud-level of panic and reverse, from which even the next generation may look down exultingly on the wisdom that has achieved so much. We have already moved toward this result in the degree that we have applied these means. Is there in what I say aught that does not appeal to our common sense for its evidence? Is there aught Utopian in it? Is it not the plain law of cause and effect, that with the policies I have indicated industries will multiply, and that with increased and still-increasing industries our exports will climb beyond our imports, and thus keep a constant and increasing stream of foreign wealth flowing to us, the accumulations of which must in time accomplish all I have described? The lake with an inlet larger than its outlet must fill. The man whose income exceeds his expenditures must grow rich. The nation which sells more than it buys must reach affluence and its people must prosper. This is a law that is indisputable and inflexible.

The policies I have indicated as productive of the results described must have root deep down in the knowledge of facts as they exist here and now, and not in the formulas of the writers. It is to lay the foundations, broad, wide, and deep, for the wisest and best statesmanship, whether I am right in believing that it will adopt these policies or not, that I urge the gathering of the statistics contemplated by this bill. As long as the American legislator shall continue to grope in the twilight of imperfect information concerning the vital interests of his people, guided only by Old World lights that glimmer to us with uncertain rays from across the waters, expect no successful statesmanship. I do not mean to imply that we have not through this Bureau and the decennial census reports much, very much, statistical knowledge at hand. That would be untrue. What I do mean to say is that this statistical knowledge is altogether incomplete for the purposes indicated without the facts contemplated by this bill.

Mr. Speaker, there is another question that is nearly allied to, nay that is a part and parcel of those of which I have been speaking, in connection with which these statistics will be of the highest value. It is the labor question.

"Coming events cast their shadows before," and from down the pathway which we must tread as we go forward into the future the shadow of this question falls upon us to-day. We shall reach the substance of that shadow while this generation is yet alive. We are almost upon it now. It cannot be avoided. Like Banquo's ghost, it will not down upon the bidding of the Macbeths, to whom the appearance is an accuser. The granger organizations, the labor guilds, the general attention which this subject is receiving in all sections, prove that this question must be met. It is vastly important that we prepare to meet it with the wisdom to which these facts will contribute.

What, sir, is this question the foot-falls of whose near approach echoes in the corridors of to-morrow? It is not as to the division of the profits arising from production between the two partners, capital and labor, as some one has defined it. This is not the labor question in any sense in which it can address itself directly to the statesman. The reason is obvious. By the genius of our free institutions every man is at liberty to act his pleasure with his own, whether it be his money, his property, or his labor, provided that by so doing he trespass not upon the rights of others. This is a principle of right upon which no agrarianism must ever intrude. There is no just man in the land that does not claim this. The law cannot make bargains among men without becoming a tyranny. What, then, is the labor question as it addresses itself to government? It is this: What policies of legislation will serve to check the aggressions of combined wealth upon the prosperity of the masses, to increase the power and rewards of industry, and to improve the condition of the workingmen of the country? This question may be subsidiary to that of the division of profits, but it is only so by consequences and not by interference.

Government can and ought to assert its prerogative whenever capital, combined or uncombined, assumes to monopolize that which of right belongs to the people, and through this to levy unjust tribute upon them. Touching this I fully expressed myself in the course of the debate upon the transportation question. Government can and ought, by furnishing free educational advantages and by, if needs be, compulsory attendance upon them, by laws for the suppression of intemperance and the promotion of sobriety and thrift, by forbidding the cruelty of chaining young children to the wheel of toil by which mind and body are dwarfed alike, by the example of requiring only reasonable hours of labor, by such a system of tariffs and currency as I have indicated—by giving the fullest effect to existing laws of primogeniture—by guarding well against the insidious building up of class based upon wealth—by forbidding the silly apings of Old World aristocratic pomp among government officials so at war with democratic ideas—by these means, or some of them at least, government may, in my judgment, promote the interests of workingmen, and help to elevate labor up to the high plane of independent manhood, where it belongs.

Abraham Lincoln, in his first annual message to Congress, used language upon this subject luminous and truthful, as were all his utterances. He said:

Labor is prior to and independent of capital. Capital is only the fruit of labor, and could never have existed if labor had not first existed. Labor is the superior of capital and deserves much the higher consideration. Capital has its rights which are worthy of protection as any other rights, nor is it denied that there is and probably will be a relation between capital and labor producing mutual benefits.

The central truth of this utterance is that labor deserves the higher consideration, but that both have rights which should not be ignored. Between the two, I assert, there are no natural antagonisms. Whatever exist are purely artificial and I believe that the policies of which I have spoken will tend to wipe them away. Cheap unintelligent labor is the curse of both employer and employed. Well-paid intelligent labor will be to the advantage of each. I believe that the policies I have mentioned will be to the advantage of each, but if not, I still insist that they are right, for I know that they are in the interests of God's millions who are born to toil. I speak only of capital when invested in some one of the industries. Capital not so invested, when it ministers only to idleness and luxury, is a thing without rights except to be taxed and protected against crime.

The chief and altogether most beneficial result of these policies will be to rapidly unite capital and labor in the same person, as in the case of the American farmer and many mechanics, which, of course, solves at once all question as to the division of profits. We have no proletariat here in the offensive sense in which this foreign term is used in other countries, a term imported to us side by side with theories of free trade. We have, however, a large population of workingmen, and it should be our study, it should be the object of our laws, to elevate them into the only order of nobility which is or ought to be recognized here, the nobility of educated, independent labor. There is no higher order of nobility than this. The stars and the ribbons that bedeck the useless drones of the Old World are less marks of honorable distinction than the toil-stains of the workingman whose intelligence and thrift have made him master of his wages. Such is the insignia of rank with which we should seek to bedeck the workingmen of this country. Let Government stretch out its hand to workingmen, build up their interests, lighten their burdens, until they shall know that God uttered a benediction and not a curse when he said to the first of human kind, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground."

Sir, who are the workingmen of America of whom I thus speak? They are nineteen-twentieths of our people. They are the bone, the sinew, the brain of the land, for in this term I include every man who avoids not this benediction, whether he tills the soil, or hammers in the shop, or takes his little lamp and goes down from the light of day to encounter the dangers of the mine; whether he plies the busy hand among looms and spindles, or swings strong arms amid giant engines and ponderous machines. I include all, for all make up the body of American workingmen. What has this body done to merit the honor of being the only nobility of the land? From its brain and genius and energy and that of its foreign kindred have sprung all the grand achievements of modern times. It has given the hundreds of labor-saving machines that clank in the mills or rattle in the homes of the people, robbing toil of its pain. It has gone down into the earth and dragged forth its riches. It has dived into the ocean and brought up its treasures. It has harnessed with steel and brass the elements, fire and water, and is driving them with the speed of the winds up and down the continent. It has stolen the tongue of the thunder-cloud and made it to speak the thoughts of men from city to city and to flash the greetings of continents underneath thousands of miles of stormy sea. It has thus stood in the midst of nature's profoundest mysteries, grappled with her giant difficulties, and caught her most subtile essence and branded it with the badge of servitude to man.

I make no mistake, I think, in saying that the class which has done all this are the true nobility of the human family. This class—and class is a word so hateful to me that I only speak it on compulsion—these people, I will say, are the regular army in the march of progress. The ear that listens can hear the music of its advance. The eye that looks up can see its banners waving against the sky. Its music is the tinkling of anvils, the whir of spindles, the boom of engines with low, sweet undertones of—

Herdboy's evening pipe and hum of housing bee.

Its pennons are the graceful wreaths of smoke that festoon the sky in beauty above a thousand workshops. Its flags are the red banners of flame that wave over a hundred furnaces. Its generals are the Morses and Fultons of to-day, and its captains are named by hundreds upon the records of your Patent Office. Such, sir, is the army, the rank and file of which are the workingmen of America. It is the body-guard of our civilization. All others—those who toil not with hand or brain—are the camp-followers, the suttlers, the hangers-on, the impedimenta. I utter, sir, no mere figure of speech, but give words, though in mataphor, to a substantial truth that deserves better rhetoric.

Shall our policies of government hereafter serve the impedimenta or the grand army of labor that is driving poverty and want before it, and that is pushing our prosperity up into the sublimest heights of success? This is a question, as I intimated a few moments ago that is to-day moving in the hearts of men all over the land. From the dark pineries of the North to the orange groves of the South, from the rugged hills of New England to the Golden Gate, this question now falls from lips in tones that speak a purpose as never before. They demand that the interest of the tiller and toiler should be the peculiar care of government. Their demand cannot but be significant of what is to be, for they wield a—

Weapon that comes down as still
As snow-flakes fall upon the sod;
But executes the freeman's will,
As lightning doth the will of God.

I have used the term, sir, American workingmen. I beg not to be understood as using it in any other sense than to designate the working people in this country as distinguished from the laboring people in other countries. Whether we are of this country by the accident of birth or the incident of naturalization we are equally Americans, and our ideas and aspirations should be, as our destiny is, the same. I hope not to be understood as using the term in a sense that hints of a distinction where none exists.

To follow the policies I have indicated the statesman's best help will be the facts proposed by this bill to be gathered by the Bureau of Statistics. Such facts will also be of much advantage in the settlement of labor strikes that occur and reoccur at industrial centers, by furnishing facts to guide in the arbitrament of the differences between employer and employed. All the labor strikes of which I have had knowledge have arisen from either an actual or alleged change in the price of the commodity produced or in some other condition affecting profits.

How valuable, then, to both employer and workman, each of whom are invariably sufferers from strikes, to have at hand reliable data from which to convince or compromise. The facts thus furnished would not of course be sufficient in themselves, but in many cases would aid in the settlement of these damaging difficulties.

Trades-unions have existed since the time of Solomon in Judea, of Thesus in Greece, and of Numa in Italy. Combinations of capital are equally as old. One created the other. These things prove that the conflict has been going on since the earliest times of which history speaks, but I trust that the broadening influence of modern ideas and the wide fields of industry opened in this country will serve soon to end it among our people at least.

As I said a few moments ago, I do not believe that there is any natural antagonism between them, and whatever will tend to destroy, whatever artificial enmity exists, will confer a blessing indeed upon all the people. The governmental policies which I have indicated I believe will do this, and necessary to such policies are the facts which we would have the Bureau of Statistics array for the use of Congress and the country.

I should now, sir, not to depart from the plan which I proposed for myself in the outstart, speak of the third reason which leads me to urge this bill. Touching this I must be brief, as I should otherwise trespass too much upon the patience of the House.

The members of the House who were present and heard the masterly and truly eloquent speech delivered a few days ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in support of the centennial appropriation bill, who listened to the rhetorical phrase in which he presented the picture of our boundless resources, of the illimitable wealth with which nature has endowed her favorite creation, this continent, could certainly thereafter have no doubt as to our capacity for absolute independence from all the world in everything which our people consume. So vividly did the gentleman portray the immense resources of the country as they will appear to the astonished descendants of Cornwallis and La Fayette in centennial hall in 1876, that the thousand leagues of fruitful lands covered with growing fruits and cereals; the rich mines of iron and of coal, of copper and of gold, of cinnabar and of silver; the forests of pine trees, among which the northern winds harp their tunes as they did before the era of Columbus; and the rich orange groves that scatter their white blossoms over the bosoms of southern streams; the sixty-two thousand miles of railway that net-work the continent, and the hundred navigable rivers that beribbon the land with silver—all these things, I say, were so vividly portrayed by the eloquence of the distinguished Pennsylvanian that I almost wish that I had the right to make his words my own, or had time to quote them here.

Sir, to the figures of our greatness, our resource, and our progress in a hundred years, already gathered by the statistician, many of which were forcibly presented by my colleague [Mr. BIERY] in his remarks upon this bill, add those which we now propose that the Bureau shall gather, and you will have exhibited in numerals that which the gentleman so finely pictured in words.

The gentleman urged Congress to appropriate $3,000,000 to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of our political independence as a nation. We ask that Congress shall expend $10,000 a year to teach us how we may gain our independence in material things as a people. The first was achieved through the armed patriotism of the men of '76. Now, when a hundred years have nearly gone by on the wings of the restless seasons, let us prepare to accomplish a second independence by the unarmed patriotism of the men of to-day. It would be the grandest poetry in history to have it written that the fact of our second independence was read in Philadelphia on the 4th day of July, 1876, from our commercial statistics. England took from the Colonies a few thousand pounds sterling in unjust taxation, and the liberty-loving men of that day rebelled. England now takes from us by the cunning of her statesmen and the fatuity of our own many million dollars annually as a tax upon our industries. Let the men of a hundred years after the Revolution, invoking not the arts of war but those of an energetic peace, again rebel against English exactions. The army of American workingmen which I mentioned a few moments ago will achieve all we ask if the opportunity is but given to them.

We have political independence which no doubt will be fittingly commemorated in 1876. Give us now commercial and industrial independence and posterity will celebrate both events with equal rejoicing.

Sir, what possible objection, can there be to this bill? The only objection that I have heard urged against it or that I conceive can be made is that it will swell somewhat our yearly expenditures, and that it will institute an espionage over our industries that will be odious to the people.

It cannot by the limitations of the bill add over $10,000 a year to our expenditures. Can we not afford this to accomplish the great good that will result? Why, sir, without the evidence of a misgiving you appropriate millions for river and harbor improvements to aid the commercial enterprise of the country. You expend vast sums to appease the wild Indians of the West, to erect forts and to build lighthouses. All this perhaps is well, if the money be honestly expended, but it surprises me, when a comparatively insignificant sum is asked for a purpose that will result in more good to every man and woman in the land than all your coast line defenses—than half your river and harbor improvements—that will result in as much humanity as your Indian gifts or your marine benefits, that objection upon the ground of expense is heard. I believe in economy as decidedly as any man here, but let it begin where the least benefit is bestowed.

As to the other objection, I beg that it be remembered that the chief of the Bureau can resort to nothing compulsory. All information must be voluntary. How, then, can it be odious? Those who make this objection are mistaken. Those engaged in industrial pursuits will with the clear, frank intelligence that is peculiarly American give every possible aid to the Bureau. They will do so the less reluctantly because they will not be slow to see the advantages which they may reap from the statistics proposed.

In the district, sir, which I have the honor to represent in this Congress—a district whose mines of coal and whose manufactories of iron are known throughout the United States, whose products of the farm and the shop are rarely equaled, a section which stands prominent among the best in productive industry—this legislation will be hailed with satisfaction; not so much because of the immediate benefits to flow from it as because it will be an indication that the policies and energies of government are hereafter to be directed to the promotion of growth and prosperity in material things, and in the interests not of the few but of the many. As in my district, so it will be elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield whatever of time I may have remaining to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Sbeaker, the question of cheap transportation discussed in connection with this bill has become one of far wider significance than that of the mere pecuniary interest involved. The evils which it seeks to remedy affect not only the material interests of the country, but menace the very form of civil government itself. It is with these questions and others like these that the Forty-third Congress is called upon to deal, charged with the injunction that if it cannot deal with them successfully another will be chosen in its stead which can.

The plain truth is, Mr. Speaker, that this Congress convened under a cloud of distrust and a threat of vengeance; and while a large portion of the people most earnestly hope and pray that it may succeed in its work, another portion are just as willing that it may fail.

While the last decade has been one of political, commercial, and social revolution, the events of the last few years have served to set free the elements of distrust, chronic discontent, and restless ambition. The people have stood dumbfounded and amazed in the presence of results, the causes of which they themselves helped to inaugurate and maintain. They have recognized the principle of danger while constantly ignoring the fact of its existence, and they have set up principalities and powers in their midst, which, if left unchecked, will sap the foundations of free government and usurp the functions of civil control. For I take it, that the dangers from these combinations of corporate power, is not more that they gather to themselves the material resources of the country, than that they break the spirit of the people and destroy the independence of the individual, thereby trampling into dust the very germ of republican government. Any system of dealing with human affairs, which wounds the pride or humbles the manhood of the citizen without cause, necessarily strikes at the vital life of republics.

Yet who does not know that the American citizen in humble circumstances enters the presence of these railroad magnates throned in their great central offices, with more fear and trembling than he approaches the President of the United States. And well he may, for launched upon their theory of action, they have tenfold more power to oppress him, than any President lined in by constitutional law.

But, sir, it is not with the weak alone that these men have to deal. The standing boast put forth in their interest for years has been, that they can make and unmake governors, seat and unseat Senators, and, if need be, drive their express trains at high rates of speed, through Legislatures, courts, and Congresses.

Ah! Mr. Speaker, it was a sad day when such a boast could be made in a free Republic. But it was sadder still, when the people had come to believe, that it was the simple God's truth of the whole matter.

What was the natural culmination of a power thus unchecked? Let my own State of Wisconsin, prostrate to-day, under a corporate edict, make answer. But do you suppose she will remain there quiet? And do you think that self-government can be maintained if she does? Have we not yet learned that no party, no corporation, no interest in this country, is mighty enough to stand above the law and defy it? Have we forgotten that the most gigantic, determined, and deadly monopoly of earth, flaunted the flag of rebellion and defied the authority of law, only to be trampled out in fire and blood?

Mr. Speaker, this local rebellion will not go out in blood, nor fire, nor in the shock of battle, nor amid the roar of cannon, but it will subside and vanish, in the presence of an aroused public sentiment, and the silent majesty of vindicated law.

I have already said enough I think to indicate to you of the East, that whatever you may think of this so-called "farmers, movement," we of the West, and I am sure they of the South, regard it of far more significance than the mere cost of transporting a bushel of grain from the interior to the sea-board.

Sir, I come not to this House accredited of the grangers; I bear about me no letters of instruction or request from them. I know nothing of their signs, their grips, or pass-words, and nothing of their forms, ceremonies, or purposes, except as the general public know them. Many of these forms and ceremonies may prove ephemeral. The secret element of their order can but be pernicious and destructive if allowed to mingle in political questions. Extravagant ideas and sanguine expectations, have in some cases beset this as they beset all new movements, and are doomed to disappointment.

But speaking now of my own immediate locality, I know these men, know the wrongs of which they complain, the forbearance with which they have suffered, the feeling which now actuates them, and the interest around which they gather. And knowing these things, and remembering what these men have done for the West, how they have reclaimed her forests and beautified her fields, and set up on the border of her streams and in the bosom of her prairies the best realization of the American home; how they carried into that country not only the "seed-corn," as my friend from Saint Louis [Mr. STANARD] has it, but all the blessings of civilization and domestic peace, long before the snort of the locomotive awoke an echo west of Lake Michigan, and when by misrepresentation and fraud they have been induced to bond their towns, and mortgage their farms, to build the very railroads which now seek to rule them! And when I have seen some of them driven out from the very homes which their own hands had fashioned, and forced in their old age to seek an abiding place elsewhere. I am resolved, that while I have a vote or voice on this floor, however faint or feeble, that no cry of "granger" and no taunt of "demagogue" shall deter me from presenting the claims of these men, as I think their merits deserve.

It must be confessed, Mr. Speaker, that the agricultural and industrial interests, aided by the public press, were the first to call a halt in the extravagance and corruption which have beset this country. So I predict that these same interests, will yet knock at the doors of this Capitol, in a way that they will not only be heard, but their reasonable wants and requests will be respected.

Their interests will no longer be discussed, as too often during this session, at odd spells, in by-places, but they will be both heard and heeded in the forefront of discussion on this floor.

Since coming to Washington I have heard "grangers" inquired about, as you would inquire about a newly discovered race of men in Alaska, or Central Africa, but too often, in a tone of suppressed ridicule or ill-concealed contempt. Sometimes in genial phrase, they have been styled the "small grangers" of the West, while at others, with less geniality of manner, it has been asked "What have these farmers got to do about it?"

Well, sir, taken individually, these farmers may not have very much "to do about it." They may not be capitalists, they may not have amassed large fortunes. Some of them may be poor; but whatever they have, whether it be much or whether it be little, it is the fruit of their own toil and they naturally desire to keep it. But when you inquire of them collectively, "What have you got to do about it?" they refer you to the recent report of the Senate Special Committee upon Transportation, which shows that 90 per cent. of all the freight that goes eastward over the northern lakes is breadstuffs, while 50 per cent. of the freight going eastward from Milwaukee and Chicago by rail is grain, and 45 per cent. is animals and their products; and pointing you to this 90 per cent. of lake carriage and 95 per cent. freight by rail, both the immediate and direct products of the farm, they tell you that is what they have "got to do about it."

As the present state of this question grew out of the general condition of things rather than from personal spite or malice, so it is only by dealing with these general conditions that we may hope to reach safe and satisfactory results. That railway monopolies the world over are becoming unbearable is apparent; that the spirit which pervades and controls them is grasping and selfish, is true; not because the men engaged in them are better or worse than other men under like conditions, but because railway monopolies are organized power; and organized power unchecked is despotism. The people have created these powers; can they now control them? If they cannot, then here is a power paramount which by its own definition must rule.

What is this power, and what are its resources? There are seventy-four thousand miles of railroads in the United States; estimated, as railroad men now estimate, at $40,000 per mile, these roadways are worth $2,960,000,000. If you will look at Poor's Railroad Manual for 1873-'74 you will find that the cost of "equipments," &c., of the railroads in the United States, exclusive of the Central and Union Pacific roads, amounts to over $3,000,000,000, thereby confirming the recent rumored saying of one of the leading railroad men of this country, that the railroad interest of the United States, wields an aggregate capital of over $6,000,000,000—three times larger than the national debt, and nearly twice as large as the entire wealth of this country in 1840. Sir, we boast of American prestige in material things. We never tire of telling of the extent of our territory, the variety of its climate, soil, and production, the length of its rivers, the breadth of its lakes, the reach of its sea-coast, and the marvelous development of its resources.

We build Chicagoes in twenty years, and when they are swept away in a night, we replace them more beautiful than before, in a twelvemonth. Our industrial enterprises cover the land, while our merchant ship bear the flag of the Republic into the most distant seas. Yet here is a power set up in our midst, which in twenty years, has gathered to itself more wealth, than this entire country possessed after three hundred years from the time of its discovery. "If they do these things in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" If Rome stood a thousand years, what have statesmen to say about these encroachments, at the end of the first century of our nation's life? But, sir, it is not in material things alone that these dangers tower around us. This power wields an army of officials, employés, and retainers of at least two hundred thousand men; yet it stops not here. It commands the best brains in the country. The keenest intellects in the professional and business walks of life are brought within its influence and control. Shippers and merchants, men of influence in their respective towns and villages, by means of special rates or special discriminations, are awed into silence or made to do its bidding.

We read in the public journals that switches have been locked, station-houses closed, and trains run at high rates of speed through a city on the Hudson, because the will of an autocrat was not heeded in collateral matters. And I have been informed that suits in equity, involving the rights of entire towns, have been compelled to be discontinued, under the threat that station-houses should be removed and railroad accommodations withdrawn. Finally, sir, as if to cap the climax, a sovereign State is deliberately told that if she shall dare to assert her authority under the forms of law, not a car shall run in all her borders.

Such is the nature, purpose, and resources of the power which confronts us. How shall it be controlled? Some say we cannot control it at all. But the answer to this is, we must control it, or be controlled by it. As I have already said, this is not a question of personal feeling, bitterness, or spite, but a question of positive forces and logical results.

Competition between intersecting or parallel roads, so long relied upon as a remedy, is now conceded on all sides to be a failure. The report of this Special Committee of the Senate on Cheap Transportation tells us that large sections of country are rapidly passing under the control of this line, or that, by common consent, Like great barons, these railway princes are parceling out the territory of the United States into separate dominions. No private enterprise can compete with them, and their own strifes at competing points only serve to double or triple rates at non-competing ones. What then is the proper remedy? Four have been proposed—control by Congress; control by State authority; construction of continental roads; and the opening up of water-ways by the Government. Which is the proper remedy? In my judgment all of them are not only proper, but indispensable to practical results. If you improve the Mississippi River and the route by the northern lakes, how will you compel the carriage of freights, at reasonable rates, from non-competing points to these water lines? Will you do it by State authority? State authority only operates within State lines. Will you do it by the authority of Congress? Congress can only operate across State lines, and not exclusively within a State at all. Will you invoke the aid of both of these powers? Then you are told that neither Congress nor the State Legislatures have any power to regulate rates upon railroads. This question of power has been so fully discussed, and the authorities sustaining it have been so often cited and recited, during the present session, that I shall content myself with stating the several conclusions which I think they sustain, namely:

First. That under that clause of the Constitution empowering Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States" its power to regulate commerce "among the several States" is coextensive with its power to regulate it "with foreign nations."

Second. That within the sphere of its exercise this power is plenary and absolute.

Third. That the "commerce" to be regulated here is the commerce carried on across State lines, and that the power to regulate, depends not upon any changed or new definition of the word "commerce," but upon the place where, rather than the mode or means by which, the same is carried on.

Fourth. That to "regulate" is to "prescribe a rule" for the government, prosecution, and control of commerce.

Fifth. That such "rule" relates not only generally to the subject-matter, but specifically to the views and instruments by which it is carrried on; to the men engaged, the vehicles employed, the route prescribed, and to whatever pertains to the safety of passengers, the security of goods, and the protection of the public, from abuse and extortion.

It is the voluntary entering upon the business of commerce, rather than the particular mode of conducting it, which subjects a party to this regulation or control. If a man, a party, or corporation desires to avoid such rules and regulations as pertain to interstate commerce, all he or it has to do, is to refrain from engaging in that kind of business.

But it is said that Congress has never attempted to regulate prices under this rule. Very true, because the necessity for so doing has never before arisen. But to argue therefore that it cannot do it in a case clearly within the scope of its power, is like saying that the authority of a board of health, shall be confined to the kind of diseases already known; but that if a new form of epidemic shall appear, more sweeping than all before, it shall have no power to deal with that. You might as well determine the jurisdiction of the General Government over an individual, by the kind of a vessel in which he crossed the ocean, or the particular port at which he entered the country, as to determine the regulations of commerce, by the kind of vehicles in which it is carried on. Commerce no more changes its nature by shifting from a boat to a rail-car than a man does when he performs the same thing.

To invite men to engage in interstate commerce, help them to establish monopolies, and then exempt them from all regulation and control, is to invite the very state of things which is already upon us with its terrible complications, its crushing weight.

But if the General Government, being a government of delegated powers, may impose these regulations upon interstate commerce, can a State, having original powers, regulate commerce carried on by railroads within its own boundaries, especially when in its organic acts it has reserved the right to do so, i. e., the right to "alter or repeal" all charters granted to corporations?

As the present discussion of this question is more particularly confined to my own State, I shall only detain the House long enough to present its general conditions.

If Wisconsin has not reserved this right, she certainly intended to do so, and supposed she had. But eminent counsel tell her, that she only grants franchises to corporate bodies to enable them to acquire lands and property, with which to serve the public, and that so soon as such property is acquired, upon the sole ground that it is wanted for the public use, it nevertheless, vests at once in them as private property, subject only to the condition, that they shall serve the public with it, but upon their own terms and conditions, and that whenever the State shall become dissatisfied with their mode of service, it has only to repeal their charter, leaving them in full ownership and control of the property thus acquired, and itself shorn of all advantages accruing from the joint undertaking. In other words, the State may select out certain individuals from all others, clothe them with corporate powers, secure to them certain property for the public use, compel other citizens to yield it up to them for that purpose though they tear down their houses to do it, prescribe the route, grant them a monopoly of the carrying trade over it, encourage and empower its citizens to bond their towns and mortgage their farms to push the enterprise to completion, and then, when all this has been done, and the State has nurtured her foster-child for twenty years or more, if she shall be dissatisfied, she may repeal the charter, lose all herself or citizens have invested, go back to stage-coaches and wagons, or allow the creature of her creat on to serve the public as it sees fit. And this we are told is the right and the only right which was so jealously guarded in the constitution of Wisconsin. That if there was any question of good faith or public trust involved, it was the State that trusted the corporation and not the corporation the State. We are further assured that a reduction of passenger-fare from four to three cents per mile and a corresponding reduction on freight is "confiscation of private property without just compensation," but that the raising of rates at a single bound from 4 to 10 per cent., thereby wiping out the profits of the farmer on his annual crop is not confiscation. That under this pretense of "public use" private property may virtually be condemned for private use; a thing which no sovereign State under heaven could do, but which its child, the corporation, may do with impunity. Mr. Speaker,

> Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed,
> That he is grown so great?

The converse of these propositions and the cause of the people of Wisconsin, may well rest in the soundness of judicial decision cited in their behalf by her ablest lawyers. Add to these powers the police power of the State, by which, while she cannot say that hacks and public conveyances shall run, yet if they do run, what rates of fare they shall charge, and her power to regulate rates and charges would seem to be ample.

Passing now from these powers of the State and national governments to their practical application, we are told the matter is so complicated and the conditions so variable that nobody but practical railroad men can prepare tariff rates which will be reasonable. Why not? Because, it is said, the "cost of the road," the "grades and curves," the "character of the goods" transported, the "amount of business," and whether "uniform or fluctuating," "climatic influences," "obstructions from ice or snow," the amount of freight each way, and whether "compact or bulky," the "price of labor," the "amount of dead weight," "length of haul," &c., present a problem the difficulties of which are but slightly understood. Yet practical railroad men do master it with all its complications. Why should not others be able to do so upon like data? And why should not such data be forthcoming under the provisions of law? Take a given line of road with facts and figures carefully prepared, and why should the problem be more difficult to solve, than that which "Old Probabilities" solves every day of his life?

It is further said that England, France, and Belgium have tried the experiment of rates and governmental interference, and failed. Yet while England, with her thirty thousand men controlling all the land in the kingdom, naturally tended to monopolies, and France directly encouraged combinations rather than competition, Belgium measureably succeeded.

The following table, furnished the special committee of the Senate, shows that a schedule of through rates can be prepared, and in that country did prove satisfactory. It shows the charge per ton per mile in 1868, including terminals, for fourth-class goods in Belgium:

	Cents.
15 miles	2.54
31 miles	1.86
46 miles	1.66
62 miles	1.38
77 miles	1.18
93 miles	1.02
108 miles	.92
124 miles	.86
139 miles	.80
155 miles	.74

Mr. William M. Grosvenor, of Saint Louis, has prepared a table of rates upon which he comments as follows:

The regularity of decrease in rate charged corresponds with a general law governing all railway service, namely, cost of loading and unloading, and fixed expenses being the same, whether the trip is long or short; cost of transportation per ton per mile regularly decreases as distance increases, being cost of haulage plus fixed cost, divided by the number of miles. Thus, if cost of loading and unloading be thirty-three cents, and other items of fixed cost twenty-seven cents per ton, the actual cost of haulage (maintenance of track, repairs, &c., included) being eighty-three hundredths of one cent per ton per mile, the cost for different distances will be eighty-three plus sixty cents divided by distance, thus:

Miles.	Haulage.	Fixed.	Total.
10	83	6.00	6.83
20	83	3.00	3.83
30	83	2.00	2.83
40	83	1.50	2.33
50	83	1.20	2.03
60	83	1.00	1.83
80	83	.75	1.58
100	83	.60	1.43
150	83	.40	1.23
200	83	.30	1.13
300	83	.20	1.03
400	83	.15	.98
1,000	83	.06	.89

But it is said that the details of a bill to regulate rates would be so multifarious that Congress could never master them. How is it with other bills abounding in details, the tariff bill, for instance, enumerating nearly every article known to commerce; or the appropriation or revenue bills? What proportion of the members of this House, called upon suddenly, could arise, amid the confusion always prevailing here, and give any intelligible account of their details? Take the late revisions of the Federal statutes, the work virtually performed by less than a dozen men and touching the minutest interests of every man, woman, and child in the Republic; though passed and sanctioned by the House, how many members outside of a limited few know anything about its details even now? It was a tremendous power to intrust to a dozen men. Supposing we had stood back aghast, and said "It will never do to intrust such powers to so few men," how could the revision ever have been made? Yet if commissions are appointed to collect data and prepare schedule rates of railway charges for the use of Congress, it is said railroad men will corrupt and own them. Only last week the New York Tribune said:

If the companies carry their point in the present case, the Illinois railroad law will collapse like the great transatlantic balloon. If they are beaten in the courts they will put their money into politics, and make Legislatures, commissions, governors, and judges to suit themselves.

Sir, is this true? Is it a fact that there are no honest men left in America? None but what can be corrupted and bought? That we cannot perform the ordinary functions of government because no men can be found fit to be trusted? And is this the doctrine which we will teach our young men in schools and colleges, on farms and in workshops?

How can we legislate at all if these things be true? How could we ever accept the details of a general tariff bill upon the assumption that the committee who prepared it, might have been corrupted by the great merchants, importers, or iron-men of the country? Yet men stand back half conceding that this railroad blight has spread so far that no man is free from its taint, and at the same time argue that it should be left unmolested. We may assume the former, and we may act upon it. We may abandon all remedies as impossible, and through love of ease or dread of opposition, tamely submit. But there are those to come after us, younger than we are, who will take up this work where we shall lay it down, and who will teach us that there is faith to be had in human nature still.

While I believe that the right of control of railroads by Congress and the State should be jealously guarded, yet practically I think it will be used mostly for auxiliary purposes, upon local lines, and to compel reasonable connection with governmental routes.

Double-track railroads and water-routes, either one or both, controlled by the Government, must be the great regulators of through rates and fares in this country. It is here where we meet with great differences of opinion, and grave doubts may well arise in the mind of any man who reflects upon the subject.

A double-track road, constructed and owned by the Government, upon which individuals and transportation companies may place their engines and cars, under proper rules and regulations, seems the most feasible plan.

I do not forget that this plan was adopted in England and pronounced a failure as early as 1840. But in that case there was this difference: the railroads were owned by the companies instead of the government, and though laws were enacted regulating the running of trains, they were evaded at every point. But with roadways owned and policed by the Government, all regulations could be strictly enforced.

The joint ownership of the roads by the Government and an incorporated company, or the granting of subsidies for its construction, under proper guards and guarantees, is strongly urged by many, but merits the most thorough and cautious consideration.

The attempt to own and operate a railroad by the Government, and to employ the force necessary to manage its vast and varied business, will swamp itself by its own complications. The cost of building a double-track steel road from New York City to Council Bluffs, as estimated by Mr. W. C. Kibbe, of the Continental Railroad Company, and submitted to the committees of both Houses of Congress, is $225,000,000. This is a large sum of money; but when we remember that Mr. Rufus Hatch, upon what seemed to be reliable data, showed, a few years since, that there was $135,225,670 of watered stock in one through line from New York to Chicago, upon which the people paid a dividend of 8 per cent., amounting to $6,211,725 annually, and which watering equaled $79,000 per mile for the whole distance from New York to Chicago, and which dividends equaled an annual tax levied upon the people amounting to $6,325 per mile, we cease to be staggered by large sums connected with the building or operating of railroads, especially when competent judges tell us from actual calculations that the entire material stock of railroads in the United States amounts to $1,000,000,000. Yet, in the face of these figures, we hear talk about confiscation and bad faith shown to railroad companies on the part of the public.

Mr. Kibbe estimates that upon such a double-track road 1,000 trains of 30 cars each could be constantly moving, and after a careful estimate of running expenses, down to the cost of running each train per mile per day, and allowing for labor, material, fixed expenses, interest on investment, &c., that, at the rate of 7½ mills per ton per mile upon 18,180,000 tons of freight, this being its annual capacity, there would be an annual surplus of $33,000,000.

The Senate special committee report that:

The average charge for the transportation of wheat from the Mississippi River to New York, by rail, for the last five years, is $16 50 per ton, equal to 15.2 mills per ton per mile, or 50 cents per bushel. At 7½ mills per ton per mile the cost of transport would be $8.83 per ton, or 26 cents per bushel.

At this rate the saving on the 55,000,000 bushels of wheat shipped from the Northwestern States in 1872 would be $13,200,000.

Saying nothing of other freights, this shows that at no distant day the Government would be justified in constructing such a road, if relief shall come in no other way.

This brings me, Mr. Speaker, to consider last in order the remedy which I think the Government should first adopt, and which, in my judgment, should have been boldly entered upon at the present session of this Congress, namely, the opening up and improvement of water-routes.

I do not mean, that we are prepared now to enter upon the vast system of improvements, presented by the special committee of the Senate upon cheap transportation; but I do mean, that one or more of these routes should be put at once in the best possible condition.

The following table, prepared for the above committee, will show the importance of water-routes in regulating and controlling rates on railroads:

Commenting upon this, the committee say:

During the year 1872 the "all-rail" rates were 24.5 per cent. higher than the "all-water" rates, the "lake and rail" rates were 7 per cent. higher than the "all-water" rates, and the "all-rail" rates were 16.3 per cent. higher than the "lake and rail" rates.

The average summer rail rate for 1872 (May, June, July, August, September, October, and November) was 31 2-7 cents, and the average winter rail rate in 1872 (December, January, February, March, and April) was 36 3-8 cents, the average winter rate being 16 per cent. higher than the average summer rate. By comparing the all-rail rates for the months of June, July, and August with the all-rail rates for December, January, and February we obtain a more accurate expression of the effect of ample water facilities in competition with equally ample rail facilities. The average all-rail rate during the three summer months just named was 27 cents, and the average of the winter months was 39 cents, the winter average being 44.4 per cent. higher than the summer average, when the competition of water transport was in full force. It may be supposed that the increase in the rail rates during the winter months is caused by the increased cost of transport during that season of the year, but this is true only to a very limited extent. The chief cause is the absence of competition by lake and canal. This is evident from the fact that although the cost of transportation by rail is not greater in October and November than in June and July, yet the average of the rates during the former months is 44.4 per cent. higher than the average of the rates during the latter months.

This rate of 12 cents per bushel, maintained through the entire year, as it would have been but for water-carriage, would have amounted, upon the wheat transported eastward in 1872, saying nothing of other grains and freights, to $6,600,000, showing the influence of the water-routes in their present imperfect condition.

Railroad managers testified before the Senate committee that during the season of navigation they regulated rates "by what the water-routes charged," and at its close "by what the property would bear," not by what will insure a fair, reasonable profit, but by leaving just so much margin as will induce the farmer to sell rather than retain his products.

As shown by authentic tables, the average price of No. 2 spring-wheat in Chicago during the year 1872 was $1.26.6. In Liverpool it was $1.86.9. The cost of transportation between these places by water was 64.3 cents. The difference in prices in excess of cost of transportation was 10.6 cents. Yet, as we have just seen, in the fall months of the same year, when labor was cheap, the weather fair, and the road-bed solid, without any conceivable cause or excuse therefor, the railroads imposed a tax of 12 cents upon every bushel of surplus wheat in the West, more than enough to wipe out the margin and close the Liverpool market against the Chicago grain. It may be replied that the water-routes did not prevent this, nor were the European markets actually closed, which is all true. But supposing there were no water-routes and this condition were to continue the year round, what would be the result then, with the railroads charging just as much as "the property would bear?"

Sir, I have said that these railroad men possessed more positive power than Presidents and Congresses. Here I present its demonstration: Dare this Congress, for any purpose whatever, impose a direct tax of 12 cents per bushel upon the farmer's wheat, and would the President sign the bill if it did? Yet here is a power which may do it, and which does do it year after year with impunity.

If water-routes must be maintained as guards and guarantees against extortionate rates and charges, then the true policy is to bring existing routes to the highest point of efficiency. It is said, however, that we cannot improve one of these routes without improving all; that local interests will prevent it. But is this a practical view to take of the matter? It must be some time before the country can be induced to enter upon the vast expenditures which all these improvements would require, estimated at $155,000,000, and which may cost twice that sum. But if we have faith in water-routes, then the true plan would be by reasonable but liberal appropriations to improve one or two existing routes, and bring them into the best possible condition. If we thereby establish the feasibility of the plan, and demonstrate that the annual saving will not only pay the interest on the investment but go far toward discharging the principal itself, then other improvements must follow at once.

It is claimed, and has been stated in debate at the other end of the Capitol, and not disputed, that the Erie Canal, by competition with railroads, has saved to the West $122,000,000, has paid its original cost of $43,000,000, and turned into the State treasury $40,000,000.

If the enterprise of a single State can accomplish this, what ought a nation to do? But which two routes shall be first improved? Fortunately this question has been settled. Nature and commerce have drawn the lines so broad and clear that national men, dealing with it as a national question, ought not to differ. The Mississippi River flows two thousand miles through one of the richest valleys of earth. Itself and tributaries drain fourteen States of the Union, and the wealth of an empire floats upon its waters. Immigration, enterprise, and trade have followed their course over the northern lakes for more than a century. New Orleans is the commercial emporium of the South, New York of the East and of the American continent.

Where men sell their commodities, there, as a rule, they make their purchases—there capital centers, enterprise develops, and exchanges are made. Between these places and their customers the lines of commerce are drawn.

As New York and New Orleans are the commercial entrepots of the East and South, so Chicago, Cincinnati, and Saint Louis are the great commercial centers of the West, and between these cities of the interior and those of the gulf and seaboard, the channels of commerce have been worn broad and deep, and over them, the tide of trade and travel will ebb and flow forever.

Here fact squares with theory. Of the 74,000,000 bushels of wheat shipped from the Northwest, in 1872, 7,000,000 went to Canada, 11,000,000 to the Gulf States, and 55,000,000 to the Atlantic seaboard.

The following interesting colloquy occurred between Senator CONKLING, of the Senate Transportation Committee, and the Hon. HENRY T. BLOW, while the latter was giving evidence before the committee at Saint Louis:

By Mr. CONKLING:

Question. You say that the enterprise and capital give themselves to eastern routes from the Mississippi basin to the Atlantic?

Answer. I do, sir.

Q. Why is that?

A. I state that as a fact.

Q. I know you did, but I ask you the reason of it?

A. I will state it a little differently from what you make it. I stated that the capital and enterprise of the country was invested in great lines across the country, through the grain-growing belt of the country. We all know that to be a fact. The railroads have absorbed the capital and enterprise of this country. Why they do it, I suppose, is because they expect to make money and good dividends from their stock, and because situated in that belt it gives a promise of perpetual profit.

Q. The point of my question was this: If grain can be carried on a down-grade to the mouth of the Mississippi and there find equal facilities with those of any other port to European markets, why does capital and why does enterprise embark in east and west lines of railroad across the country to the Atlantic rather than in the north and south lines to the Gulf of Mexico?

A. I think that is very simple: because the east and west lines run to the great cities, from which the grain of the country has generally been exported, and where the importations of the country come back in return.

Q. Do you think it is from a mere spirit of imitation that, because it has been, therefore capital elects to keep it so?

A. No, sir; I do not think that, but I think that the condition of the great routes south and the condition of the South itself, with its capital entirely gone, render it for the time being impossible for it to act at all as a capitalist.

Q. You speak now of the condition of things since the war?

A. I am speaking of the war and the condition since.

Q. Wasn't the same thing true previous to the war?

A. Previous to the war, my recollection is this: that we hadn't engaged in the exportation of grain to as great an extent, but that we had a much larger share of it in proportion than we have now. You see you are going back twelve or fifteen years.

Q. If you will allow me, I want to make a record of your reasons for the fact that the tread of enterprise and capital is from these basins east and west, and not north and south. I wish you to state, as you understand them, the reasons for that fact.

A. I believe it has its foundation, first, in a prejudice of capitalists, or a fear, if you please, with regard to the investment of money; second, in the fact that those railroads do run through these great grain-growing States—through the grain-belt. The great article of transportation on those railroads is grain that is grown in this country. It is necessarily the grain, because it is the only thing that they can export, and they are built for that purpose.

* * * * * * *

Q. They didn't run through the grain-belt until they were built, and I am asking you how they came to be built on a line of latitude rather than on a line of longitude.

A. I think I have stated that because the latitude had the grain and the longitude had not. For instance, the minute that you get below this city, you don't run through these grain-growing States. The grain grown in Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas is for local consumption, and hardly enough for that, while the grain grown in this belt of the country is for exportation, and because it is for exportation you have this very question here between the Grangers and the rail roads. Now, if you can get what you want from the statement of facts, you can arrive at it.

I cite the above simply to show that, in the improvement of the two proposed lines, the expenditure will be largely in favor of the South in proportion to the capital and commerce involved.

The following, taken from the report of the Senate committee, shows the relative tonnage of various ports and the causes which affect the courses of trade:

Why is it that, with all these advantages, so large a proportion of the heavy products of the West cross the Mississippi River and climb over high mountains, on expensive railways, rather than float down the river-current to the ocean? There are various circumstances which determine the course of trade beside the current rates of transportation. The magnitude of the grain business of a port depends upon the amount of available tonnage seeking freights, and this depends largely upon the general business of the port. This is true not only with respect to grain, but of all commodities which will not bear the cost of a round trip. It is not true, however, in regard to more valuable commodities, such as cotton, tea, sugar, and other articles of commerce, which can bear freight-charges high enough to meet the necessary profits for both the inward and outward voyage.

This is illustrated by the statistics of imports and exports at New Orleans and New York, and of other commercial seaports of the United States. There are no available statistics indicating the weight and volume of the commodities exported from and imported into the several ports of the United States—only the values and the amount of tonnage entered can be stated.

Value of imports and exports of ports of the United States during the year ending June 30, 1872.

Cities.	Value of imports.	Value of exports.	Tonnage entered from foreign ports.
			Tons.
Boston	$70,398,185	$21,443,154	881,486

San Francisco	33,330,501	26,243,061	423,572

NOTE.—The value of imports is expressed in gold, and the value of exports in currency.

The tonnage of large ocean steamers is now from 3,000 to 5,000 tons, and these have proved the most economical and profitable for ocean-borne freight. The ports the business of which will justify the establishment of lines of these steamers, and insure their arrival and departure at regular intervals, must be the ones which will command the interior trade. Yet the average tonnage of vessels entering the port of New Orleans, as shown by the report of the above committee, is 1,050 tons, showing that while it is conceded to be the cheaper route, all this is overcome by obstructions at the mouth of the river; and which may be removed by an outlay of from $5,000,000 to $8,000,000, so that the largest ocean-steamers may touch the docks at New Orleans.

Two conditions must be met in the establishment of continental routes:

1. A full and regular supply of tonnage at the seaboard, with minimum rates for freights.

2. A full and regular supply of interior tonnage connecting therewith.

Establish a full and sufficient outlet at Buffalo and New Orleans, and tonnage on the lakes and river will adjust itself to the demands of commerce. Barge lines will be established on the rivers, and steamers of 500 tons be placed on the lakes, which could easily pass through the canals to the seaboard. Transfer charges would be avoided, while water rates would be more uniform and railway charges be regulated. Thus the whole business of transportation would be taken out of the realm of chance and speculation and brought more within the rules of legitimate business. Grain gambling would to some extent be discouraged by a regularity of prices, while the honest producer and honest carrier would receive more of the just rewards of their labors.

The Union' Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis has estimated the cost of removing the obstructions at the mouth of the Mississippi, from eight to ten feet to Saint Louis, and five feet thence to the Falls of Saint Anthony, and four and a half feet above that point, at $16,010,000.

Upon this improvement the Senate committee comment as follows:

Persons best informed on this subject believe that, upon the completion of the entire river improvements, and with the largely increased business which is expected to result therefrom, grain can be transported in barges from Saint Paul to New Orleans at a fair profit for from 12 to 15 cents per bushel. Capt. W. F. Davidson, a gentleman of large experience in river navigation, has expressed the opinion that, with the improved river, the cost per bushel from Saint Paul to New Orleans need not exceed 12 cents. Estimating the probable cost at 15 cents per bushel to New Orleans, and at 27 cents from there to Liverpool, (the present average,) and the two transfers at Saint Louis and New Orleans at 1 cent each, the entire cost from Saint Paul to Liverpool would be 44 cents. The present cost by the cheapest routes, including elevator and terminal charges at western lake ports and at Buffalo and New York, averages about 71 cents per bushel. A saving of 27 cents per bushel could therefore be effected, which on the corn and wheat crops of Iowa and Minnesota alone would amount to over $36,000,000 per annum, more than enough to pay every year double the cost of the entire improvements.

The merits of the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, already ordered by the Government and estimated to cost $3,000,000, cannot be more concisely stated than in the following extract from the report of the Senate committee, made up largely from facts and figures furnished by Breese J. Stevens, esq., of Wisconsin:

In case the above estimate be considered too low for the water-route. the following is also submitted, it being based upon an assumed charge of 6 mills per ton per mile down the Mississippi River and through the Fox and Wisconsin improvement, and 8 mills per ton per mile up the Mississippi. The following are the results of such comparison:

From—	Actual cost per bushel of sixty pounds to Chicago by rail.	Estimated cost per bushel of sixty pounds to Green Bay via the Fox and Wisconsin improvement and the Mississippi River.	Saving by the improvement.
Saint Paul	$0 19.3	$0 8.7	$0 10.6
Winona	18.4	6.5	11.9
La Crosse	18.4	5.9	12.5
Prairie du Chien	18.4	4.8	13.6
Dubuque	17	5.1	11.9
Savannah	18	7.5	10.5
Fulton	17.5	7.9	9.6
Rock Island	15	8.8	6.2
Burlington	12	11.5	5
Average	17.1	7.4	9.7

Computing the cost at the rates last named, which are higher than the usual river charges, and about equal to the average carriers' charges on the Erie Canal, we find the average cost for all the ports named by the proposed water-route to be only 7.4 cents per bushel, against 17.1 cents by rail, showing a saving of 9.7 cents per bushel. The surplus of wheat and corn in Iowa and Minnesota in 1873 being over 60,000,000 bushels, the annual saving to be effected by the proposed improvement will amount to $6,000,000, or twice as much for a single year as the entire cost of the work. To this must be added a similar saving per bushel on the wheat and corn of Nebraska, and of a large part of Illinois and Wisconsin.

By referring to the crop-map in the appendix, showing the localities in which a surplus of wheat is produced, it will be observed that this improvement connects the lakes by direct water communication with the largest and most productive wheat region on the continent, and seems especially designed to afford for it the cheapest possible outlet to market. It is the shortest and cheapest connection with the most prolific wheat areas of Minnesota, Northern Wisconsin, and Iowa; and it passes through the richest wheat-producing region of Central Wisconsin. The four counties of Dane, Dodge, Columbia, and Fond du Lac, situated directly upon the proposed route, produced in 1869 an aggregate surplus of over 7,000,000 bushels of wheat. The other counties of Wisconsin which are closely contiguous to the Mississippi River produced an aggregate surplus of over 3,500,000 bushels, making a total surplus of over 10,500,000 bushels in Wisconsin, which would be benefited to the extent of the reduction above estimated.

Selecting from the committee's estimates of various routes I find the cost of completing these two great routes would be as follows:

Improvement of the Mississippi below the Falls of St. Anthony	$11,000,000
Improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers	3,000,000
The improvement, with the concurrence of the State of New York, either of the Erie Canal from Buffalo to Albany, or the improvement of the Oswego Canal to Albany, or the Champlain Canal from Lake Champlain to deep water on the Hudson, and including a connection between Lake Champlain and the Saint Lawrence River, each of which is estimated at	12,000,000
Total	26,000,000

It is stated that in the ten years from 1855 to 1864, inclusive, the total number of tons moved one mile by the New York Central Railroad was 2,132,073,612, and by the Erie Railroad 2,587,274,914 tons; by the New York canals 8,175,803,065 tons; and the average charges of the Central Railway were 2.6 cents, Erie Railway 2.22 cents, and the canals, .91 cents per ton per mile. Had the freights which were carried by canal for the ten years been carried by rail, the additional freight-charges would have amounted to $122,637,045.97.

Thus, if, upon the limited capacity of the Erie Canal and the amount of business of ten and twenty years ago, the saving was over $20,000,000 per annum upon a single route, what must be the saving upon all of these routes when improved, with the increased business of the present time?

The cost of the Erie Canal was $43,639,000. The cost of the Canadian Canal, $35,639,000. The cost of a double-track railroad is estimated at over $200,000,000. And yet with these estimates and examples before us, showing what a small dominion or a single State can do, we hesitate to invest $26,000,000 sure to bring an annual return equal if not double the original investment. This money expended among the farmers, laborers, and business-men of the West and South would be like seed sown upon good ground.

The retention of from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 per annum among the producers of wealth would have a wonderful effect in developing not only agriculture, but manufactures and commerce as well. Give the farmer an annual surplus of $500 or $1,000, and he will buy more land for his boys, or he will fence in and improve new fields. Place the laborer where by practicing rigid economy he can save up from $200 to $300 per year, and he will purchase a vacant lot, erect a house, and his little home, take an interest in the affairs of his town, and become a satisfied and hopeful citizen. We can pursue this course in the line of statesmanship, or we can charge as much as the "property will bear," send the proceeds to Wall street to be invested in stock-gambling operations, and let the profits appear in fine equipages, elegant mansions, large fortunes suddenly amassed, and capital to be reloaned again to the producers at ruinous rates of interest.

Sir, we can pursue the one course, and build up the citizen and strengthen the country and her institutions; or we can pursue the other darken hope, and furnish food for communism.

The one course elevates the citizen and stimulates him to higher endeavors; the other robs wealth itself of the respect due to it, when legitimately acquired.

That condition is the best in life where thrift is the fruit of honest toil and common prudence. But when capital becomes so grasping that want and poverty stare in at every door and window of the laborer, and the shadow of despair falls across the hearthstone, then it is that educated labor becomes a slumbering volcano. When in the public journals we read morning, noon, and night of "strikes" among all classes of laborers, while we may be unable to decide upon the merits of any given case, we cannot fail to see that combinations of capital and combinations of labor are assuming an attitude toward each other in this country, which may well arrest the attention and challenge the thought of our profoundest statesmen.

We want in America no communism, no agrarian ideas, no confiscation of goods, but simply, in the language of the immortal Lincoln, "to lift artificial weights from all shoulders, to clear the path of laudable pursuit for all, to afford all an unfettered start and a fair chance in the race of life."

Mr. Speaker, we do not forget that railroads have built up the waste places of the West and made her fields "to blossom like the rose." Her lands could never have been settled so rapidly nor her bounteous harvests ever been gathered but for steam-cars on the one hand and improved agricultural machinery on the other; and while she would foster every useful invention and improvement, she only asks that they be not made instruments of injustice or extortion. She wages no war against railroads as such. She would see them liberally, even generously, supported. She desires only even-handed justice between these great corporations and the people, and she looks hopefully forward to that "consummation most devoutly to be wished" when all interests shall submit themselves to the authority of law, when enterprise shall receive its highest incentives, capital its proper percentage, and labor its just rewards.

IRON-MOLDERS' UNION.

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Education and Labor having reported to the House a bill "to incorporate the National Iron-molders' Union," and as that committee will not probably be called in the regular order before the close of the session, I propose at the first convenient opportunity to ask a suspension of the rules for the purpose of putting the bill upon its passage.

This course will preclude debate, and desiring to call attention to the measure I will now refer to some of the provisions of the bill.

The first section provides for the incorporation of the iron-molders' union therein named, and it further provides that "their associates and successors be, and are hereby, created an incorporation by the name and title of the Iron-molders' National Union," and by such name and title they shall have perpetual succession and shall be capable of suing and being sued, pleading and being impleaded, and of granting and receiving in its corporate name property, real, personal, and mixed, and of using said property and the proceeds and income thereof for the objects of said corporation.

The iron molders named in the bill are reputable and worthy men of the trade, and they represent about nine thousand mechanics connected with this useful industry in the United States.

Local unions have been organized in nearly every State and Territory, and for the purpose of carrying out more fully the benevolent designs of the order, a national union has been formed, and William Saffin, of Cincinnati, has been elected president.

In carrying out the objects of the association they have felt the need of a charter, not only to strengthen the credit of the union but to facilitate the transaction of business in the investment of funds, in the buying and selling of property, and the general management of its business affairs.

Without a charter the investments and business operations of the union must necessarily be carried on in the name of agents and trustees, resulting sometimes in needless expense and great inconvenience, and liable through death and other changes to complications, litigations, and losses. These results the iron-molders desire to avoid, and by obtaining a charter the business transactions of the union can be conducted without the useless machinery and expense which now embarrass their operations.

It is the intention of the union, as we are informed by its representatives, to erect halls for the convenience of local or auxiliary unions, and to establish libraries and lyceums for the moral and intellectual improvement of the craft.

Furthermore, as the interests and necessities of the iron-molders may from time to time require new and enlarged fields for employment, they propose to establish co-operative shops and foundries for their mutual benefit and advantage. They seek in this orderly and practicable mode to avoid contentions and conflicts with other citizens, and they anticipate beneficent results to grow out of the practical application of a well-settled principle of social science, thereby securing to themselves a better reward for toil in the joint earnings of their own capital and labor.

The Committee on Education and Labor, after a careful consideration of the measure, have agreed upon this bill, and they have directed me to report the same to the House and recommend its passage.

I see no objection to the bill; on the contrary, it appears to me plain that the iron-molders of the country should be supported and encouraged in the laudable and praiseworthy efforts now being made by them to elevate and improve the condition of the trade, and it is to be hoped that they may realize through association or co-operation all the benefits the system is so well calculated to secure, and I sincerely hope they may be successful in the undertaking, not doubting myself that the tendency of co-operation will be to an elevated standard of workmanship, greater skill and efficiency in the work, and a better reward for honest and deserving toil.

Mr. Speaker, I find a great many precedents in the acts of Congress to sustain the action which the committee recommend upon this bill; but I will refer only to a few charters of a similar character which have been granted since the close of the Thirty-seventh Congress, as follows: The National Theological Institute; The National Safe Deposit Company; The National Capitol Insurance Company; The National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America; The National Hotel Company; The National Bolivian Navigation Company; The National Life Insurance and Trust Company; The National Savings Bank.

And now, Mr. Speaker, when nine thousand workingmen ask Congress to grant a charter simply to enable them to buy and sell property and transact the business connected with their mechanical trade, I feel satisfied that every gentleman here with a disposition of fairness and consistency will not hesitate in supporting this bill, and I hope it may become a law before the close of the session.

The iron-moulders throughout the land take a deep interest in the matter, and I hope they may not be disappointed.

Mr. STANDIFORD. Mr. Speaker, after a careful consideration of this bill and the objects which it is intended to accomplish, I am compelled to say that in my opinion it is a measure eminently just and proper, and one which should become a law.

This is not a bill which proposes an appropriation for the benefit of these workingmen nor is there any remote possibility that the United States will be asked to give a dollar out of the Treasury, nor can I see in it any possible chance that the rights of any citizen or class of citizens shall be infringed by reason of it.

The advantages which it proposes to the iron-molders are simply that under its provisions they may organize societies for the improvement of their craft, establish reading-rooms and libraries for the benefit of members, collect and keep together funds for the benefit of sick and disabled members of their order while living, and the relief of the widows and orphans of deceased members and to be able to compel a strict account from the trustees of such funds. It will enable them to hold property in the name of their association, to collect their dues and make them responsible as an association for their debts. It will give them no more power over the capitalists of the country than they hold to-day through their present organizations.

The bill will enable molders to establish and maintain co-operative associations in which the profits of their labor are divided among themselves instead of payment of wages. If they desire to secure the benefit of their labor in that way instead of wages, I see no objection to their doing so. Other societies, other organizations, come here and ask to be incorporated, and are given charters, and in many instances these charters are accompanied by immense subsidies and grants.

Is it because these men are workingmen that we should not grant privileges to them that we give to others? Is the mechanic that furnishes the motive-power for this iron age of progress unfit to be trusted with the exercise of corporate rights? If so let it be so declared by our refusal to pass this bill.

There ought to be no controversy between capital and labor, nor need there be if there was a proper understanding between the laborer and his employer. The great cause of difficulty in this respect is the failure of the majority of those who employ labor to recognize the intellectual capacity and needs of the workingmen as distinguished from the mere physical force which he brings to bear in the production of the various articles of skill which combine to make our commerce.

They seem in many instances to recognize the mechanic only as a machine out of which it is the true policy of trade to get as much force and productive capacity with as little expense as possible. They seem to forget that their best interests may be subserved by appealing to the manhood of the workingmen, exciting their ambition to excel, and rewarding their efforts in that direction.

If there could be a better feeling of mutual interest established between the mechanic and his employer, this question of labor and capital would in my opinion cease to be a complication. If the capitalist would consult more freely with those he employs as to their needs with a view of ameliorating their condition, when it could be done without serious detriment to his business, he would find that their demands would not be extravagant or unreasonable, and he would obtain as a free gift that which he fails to get by exciting their hostility, and receive their friendship personally and their interest as a class in his affairs and for his success. I am speaking now of the real workingmen of the country, and leaving out those pestiferous busybodies and demagogues who assume to represent the interests and advocate the wants of the workingmen, but who are repudiated by them.

The real mechanics of our country as a class are an intelligent, educated, and worthy class of men, and who are from the nature of their training and habits of thought honest. Unaccustomed to the practice of diplomacy or duplicity, they state their wants in a manly, straightforward way, and expect to be met and answered in the same spirit. Although this is a measure of vital interest to them, they have no lobby delegates employed to urge members to favor it or press its adoption.

There has been one result of the trades-unions, especially in the class of mechanics whose case we are now considering, which has been of the greatest advantage to the country at large: I mean the elevation in all that pertains to true manhood and good citizenship of the molder. And what is true of one class of laborers in respect to these organizations is true of all.

Nearly every trade has found it necessary to organize societies for mutual protection and benefit, and they have been not only beneficial to the workingmen, but in themselves have worked no injury to the interests of trade. At last the agriculturists have awakened to the necessity of organization. Granges have sprung up all over the country. The necessity for these organizations has been caused in a great measure by unjust legislation. The wealthier classes have had the best chances in our legislative halls, and the people are restive under the burdens which they feel being imposed upon them.

The property of the holders of bonds have been steadily, carefully, and jealously guarded until it has increased to double its original cost to them. This class of our citizens "toil not, neither do they spin," and yet they live off the best the country can produce and are clothed in luxury and ease; their property and incomes are held too sacred in the eyes of the Government to be taxed, while the laborer, the mechanic, and farmer toil through the laboring hours to furnish the means of this luxurious support. The time will come, and that shortly, too, when the farmers and mechanics of this country will assert their rights as a mass having interests too vital to pay tribute to the eastern bondholders, monopolists, or other moneyed powers. In a republic the burdens of the government ought to rest equally upon all; but instead of this our laws place the heaviest weight upon those least able to bear them. These eastern capitalists, these aristocratic bondholders, who set in their brokers' offices and control the financial interests of the nation, yes, even the Executive, are the ones who oppose anything in the shape of favorable legislation for the workingmen of the country, and who sneer at the demands of the West and the South, but who have only to ask for whatever the country can supply and Congress or the Executive power immediately acceeds to their demands. This has been the policy of the party in power for the last ten years. We all remember how a short time since, in these Halls, when the West and the South were asking for an increase of the currency, argument and irony, wit and sarcasm were brought to bear against it by these moneyed kings; resolutions, letters, printed articles, pamphlets, books, statistics, and the like were showered in upon us until, like a cloud of locusts, they obscured the sun. And yet, when we consider the inconsistency, I might rather say the unmitigated selfishness of their conduct, it gives rise to a natural feeling of resistance. When the panic was threatening these money centers with ruin how soon they came and demanded an inflation of the currency, and got it, too, to the extent of $26,000,000 issued in favor of these men in violation of law.

This inequality of taxation, legislation, and distribution of Executive favor is wrong, and until the equilibrium is restored this contest between capital and labor will go on, and may reach a serious result unless it is remedied. We talk about the people in terms of glowing eulogy, and then vote their money away in schemes of speculation. It is time that this kind of law-making was changed, and we make some laws really for the benefit of the workingmen and see to it that they are executed.

Previous to 1857, when the first molders' union was attempted, they as a class were a disorganized body of laborers who were compelled to dispose of their labor and skill for the price which the circumstances of the locality in which they lived permitted them to command, and in no part of the country could they obtain more than living wages, and scarcely that; for employers in places where labor was plenty could command it at their own price and go into the market and undersell those who were willing to pay an adequate price for wages. Since the organization of these unions this is all changed, knowing that he is able to protect himself from the extortion and avarice of unjust masters, his ambition is appealed to and the desire to excel in his calling, has taken the place of that tread-mill apathy which characterized him before, and the increased prosperity of the iron-manufacturing interest is evidence of its advantage to the capitalist who has invested his money in this branch of industry.

I am largely interested in business myself, and have occasion to employ a great many laborers in various capacities, and my experience teaches me that the more we encourage and foster the laboring classes the better it is for all. I have found also that paying the highest price for labor and then demanding and accepting only the best is one of the secrets of profitable business, and that the cheapest labor is to get good, skillful, intelligent men and pay them liberal wages.

The laboring men are the great distributers of the money of the country. They are not only the producers but are the consumers, and when they are thrown out of employment or their wages cut down we may expect to have hard times. All classes of trade are interested in their prosperity.

We should remember that the true strength and prosperity of our Government rests not with the representatives of wealth, but in the laboring classes; and if we would keep alive the fires of patriotism we must do it by fostering and caring for our workingmen.

These mechanics ask nothing of us that we are not in duty bound to give them. Other countries have extended this same protection to their skilled mechanics, and why should not we? If monarchies are willing to honor labor, it ill becomes the representatives of a republic to turn their backs upon the soiled garments of the mechanic.

The cry of communism and internationalism which some one has attempted to raise against the adoption of this measure is unworthy of consideration. The conduct of our mechanics, and their sentiments as expressed in the resolutions of their conventions during the time when foolhardy lunatics were attempting to raise the red flag of the French commune in this country, shows conclusively that our mechanics were not only not in sympathy with any such movement, but bitterly and positively opposed to it, and with reason, for its success would be the death-blow to everything which they could hope to gain by their organization, and was so recognized by them.

I hope that the House will grant the favorable consideration which this bill deserves, and give to these sons of toil—the architects of our prosperity in peace and our defenders in war—the protection which they ask at our hands; and I am sure that it will be an act that will never be regretted by any member who gives it his vote.

[Mr. BANNING, and Mr. CROSSLAND also addressed the House. Their remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. RAINEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. DAVIS: The remonstrance of John S. Carlile and others, attorneys, against the passage of any law depriving the district court of the United States for the district of West Virginia of circuit court powers, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DURHAM: The petition of Margaret C. Bell, widow of Rear-Admiral Henry H. Bell, United States Navy, for increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of citizens of Fort Smith, Arkansas, for the abolition of the western judicial district of Arkansas, to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

Also, the petition of citizens of Sebastian County, Arkansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of citizens of Washington, Benton, and other counties in the western district of Arkansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. SMITH, of Louisiana: The petition of citizens of Bossier Parish, Louisiana, for the establishment of a post-route from Collinsburgh, Louisiana, via Red Land, to Magnolia, Arkansas, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the petition of R. M. Kearney, of Natchitoches, Louisiana, to be awarded suitable compensation for legal services in behalf of the Government, to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of Mrs. Maria Waits, of New Orleans, Louisiana, to be compensated for the use of her house as a private hospital for United States officers and soldiers and for services and expenses as a nurse, to the Committee on Claims.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 10, 1874.

The Senate met at twelve o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the memorial of a large number of merchants of the city of New York, and a memorial of citizens of Portsmouth, Scioto County, eleventh district of Ohio, protesting against the passage of the law permitting growers of leaf-tobacco to sell $100 worth of their crop at retail to consumers without license or tax; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of citizens of Lancaster and York Counties, Pennsylvania, asking for an appropriation for the improvement of the Susquehanna River; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

He also presented a petition of underwriters of Pennsylvania, concerning the Geneva award; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WINDOM. I present resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New Orleans, which, as they are brief, I will ask consent of the Senate to read:

Whereas the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans have for many years with remarkable unanimity advocated the project of the Fort Saint Philip Canal as affording the most certain and permanent outlet from the Mississippi River to the ocean; and whereas the views of this chamber have received the cordial indorsement of a large majority of the United States engineer board:

Be it resolved, first, That the passage of the Fort Saint Philip Canal bill by the lower House of Congress affords to this chamber convincing evidence that the nation's representatives recognize the great need of the millions who inhabit the Mississippi Valley, and that the enactment into law of said measure will inspire all who dwell in this valley with new hopes, and dispel much of the gloom that now overhangs the material prosperity of Louisiana.

Second. That we respectfully renew our earnest petition to the Senate and the President to complete the good work at this session, as our needs are most pressing, and delay is death to our commerce.

Resolved, That these resolutions be transmitted by telegraph to Senator WINDOM, of Minnesota, with a request that he present them to the Senate on behalf of the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans.

J. H. OGLESBY,
President.
WM. M. BURWELL,
Secretary.

I move the reference of these resolutions to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to make a point of order on the petition presented by the Senator from Minnesota, that the Senate cannot receive a telegraphic petition. I wish to have it entered in the Journal, if I am right, that it is done by unanimous consent. I do not wish to object to its being received.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not the slightest objection to receiving it, but as a precedent for the future, I do not think we ought to be bound always to receive telegraphic petitions.

Mr. WINDOM. I asked consent at the time; at least I intended to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection. The paper will be received by unanimous consent and referred to the committee indicated.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of William H. Harding, late private Company A, Seventy-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TIPTON presented a memorial of citizens of Nebraska, protesting against extending letters-patent for the Haines harvester; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. THURMAN presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Ohio State Editorial Association, held at Columbus, Ohio, approving of the postage regulations for newspapers now pending in the Senate, and for free exchanges and free delivery of newspapers within the county wherein published; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WADLEIGH presented the petition of Moses Marshall, praying the passage of a law authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to hear and determine an application for the extension of letters-patent for an improvement in knitting-machines for a further term of seven years; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the memorial of the heirs of Colonel Frederick DeWeissenfels of the army of the Revolution, praying payment of the half-pay for life due him for his services in the revolutionary army; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. CONKLING presented the memorial of Hatch & Foote, Harriot & Noyes, Shepherd Knapp, jr., and 268 other firms of bankers, brokers, and dealers in coin, bills of exchange, stocks, and other securities in the city of New York, remonstrating against the imposition of a tax on the sale of coin and securities; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of George Tobin, late captain Com D, Sixty-third Regiment New York Infantry Volunteers, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STEVENSON presented papers in relation to the claim of Charles M. Briggs, of Kentucky, praying compensation for cotton taken from him by the United States troops in 1863; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3080) to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, and to confirm existing leases, reported it adversely, and asked that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3352) to further provide for the sale of certain lands in Kansas, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 623) to enable the Secretary of State to pay salaries to certain of the commissioners to the Vienna exposition, appointed under the authority of joint resolution approved February 14, 1873, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 824) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Asia, and the bill (S. No. 681) to secure antimonopoly cable communication between Europe, America, and Asia, by W. Cornell Jewett and his associates, reported adversely thereon; and the bills were postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HOWE. I am instructed by the same committee to report a new bill as a substitute for the bills postponed indefinitely.

The bill (S. No. 919) relating to telegraphic communication between the United States and foreign countries was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I move to proceed to the consideration of the resolution which was before the Senate the other day in regard to the pay of Mr. Sykes.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask leave to introduce two bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in the nature of an objection; the morning business not being completed, reports of committees are still in order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3025) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873, reported it with amendments.

Mr. TIPTON. I move to proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 59, being a resolution to appoint General Sherman and others a committee to select an artist in a certain case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have a resolution to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Resolutions are not yet in order.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1778) granting permission for a railway from the wharf of the Baltimore Steam-Packet Company, at Old Point Comfort, Elizabeth City County, Virginia, to Mill Creek bridge, in the same county, reported it with an amendment.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Ordered, That House bill No. 2897, authorizing the President to appoint George Henry Preble, now a captain on the active list of the Navy, to be a commodore, be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 920) to abolish the board of Indian commissioners; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 921) to annex the Indian country to the district of Kansas for judicial purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WIGHT STREET, DETROIT.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask leave to take up the bill (H. R. No. 1706) to authorize the opening of Wight street through the grounds of the United States marine hospital at Detroit, Michigan, a bill that the Senators from Michigan desire very much to have passed. It has already passed the House and been reported favorably by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

An amendment was reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to cause Wight street, in the city of Detroit, Michigan, to be increased in width fifty feet in that portion of said street adjacent to the marine-hospital grounds of said city: Provided, That George Jerome, John Owen, and C. H. Buhl, of said city, shall be appointed appraisers to ascertain and report to the Secretary of the Treasury the damages resulting to the United States by using a strip of land from the marine-hospital grounds aforesaid for that purpose, and that the Detroit Transit Railway Company of said city shall pay into the Treasury of the United States the amount of damages ascertained and reported as herein provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. I should be glad to know whether this involves any expense to the United States.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not a farthing.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the widening of Wight street through the grounds of the United States marine hospital, at Detroit, Michigan.

SALES OF CHIPPEWA LANDS.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolutions; which were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to inquire and report to the second session of the Forty-third Congress whether any lands have been sold under the provisions of the treaties of September 30, 1854, and February 22, 1855, with the Chippewa Indians, and of the act of June 8, 1872, entitled "An act to perfect certain land titles therein described," or are claimed to be taken or located at less than their actual market value at the time of sale or otherwise unjustly, and if so, upon what portion of said sales claims are still pending before the Department for the issue of patents therefor.

And resolved further, That until said committee shall report hereon the executive officers of the Government are requested to issue no patent upon any of said lands.

COURTS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. TIPTON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 59) amending joint resolution of April 16, 1872, relating to a statue of the late Admiral Farragut.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I had a motion that I thought was laid aside informally, subject to morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland object to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I do.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to make a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 693) to change the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin, at Oshkosh, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back without amendment. It is a local bill, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole The time of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin, at Oshkosh, is fixed for the second Tuesday of July of each year, instead of the first Monday of July as now provided by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I ask to take up Senate bill No. 154 for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair regards morning business as concluded unless there be further resolutions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2102.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] made a prior motion, which was informally passed over to allow the morning business to be completed.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I rise with morning business. I am instructed by the Committee on the Revision of the Rules, to whom was referred the following proposed amendment to the rules:

Resolved, That the first rule of the Senate be amended so that it shall read as follows:

1. The Presiding Officer having taken the chair, the Journal of the preceding day shall be read, to the end that any mistake may be corrected that shall be made in the entries. No business except reading the Journal shall be transacted unless a quorum shall be present.

A quorum shall consist of a majority of the Senators duly chosen and sworn—to report the same back, and recommend adverse action upon the proposition.

The resolution was indefinitely postponed.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution in regard to the payment of money to Mr. Sykes.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution referred to is before the Senate, and the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.]

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$3,000" and inserting "$6,500."

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the whole proposition be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The original resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Francis W. Sykes, late contestant from the State of Alabama, out of the appropriations for compensation and mileage for Senators, the sum of $8,374.80, being the salary of a Senator from the 4th day of March, 1873, to the 28th day of May, 1874, inclusive.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] proposed to amend by striking out "$8,374.80, being the salary of a Senator from the 4th day of March, 1873, to the 28th day of May, 1874, inclusive," and inserting "$3,000." It is now proposed to amend the amendment by striking out "$3,000" and inserting "$6,500."

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Sixty-five hundred dollars is the amount of the pay under the present law.

Mr. CONKLING. Before we vote upon it, I should like to understand the ground upon which the Senator from Maryland commends it to us.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. There are two grounds upon which it is commended to the consideration of the Senate. The first is that this is the compensation coming to this gentleman at the present rate allowed by law. It is the compensation he would be entitled to according to the precedents, as the Senator will understand.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the salary?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Yes, the salary we are now receiving ourselves, without respect to the increase made last year. The next ground is that this sum comes nearer to the actual expenditure than anything else proposed, as far as I am advised, because there was a great deal of transcribing and all that kind of thing and copying and also the reporting of speeches and having counsel here in attendance. The absolute money expenses of Mr. Sykes without respect to counsel fees in the case (and there were able counsel present arguing the case) amounted to between four and five thousand dollars. I am so advised—in absolute expenditures of money in the case. Therefore $6,500 I consider reasonable in view of everything and taking into consideration what has always been paid in cases of contests of this kind where there was good faith in the contest. I think we ought to adopt this amount.

Mr. STEWART. Is there a report in this case?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. There is a report in the case from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. STEWART. It is important that the facts should be stated.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The chairman can state the facts.

Mr. STEWART. They ought to be stated on the record.

Mr. THURMAN. They are stated in both the majority and minority reports.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Nevada wants to know if there is a written report as to this resolution.

Mr. MORTON. There is not.

Mr. STEWART. Another case was sent to the Judiciary Committee and they made a written report stating the grounds of the allowance.

Mr. THURMAN. That is an entire mistake.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The Senator from Nevada is mistaken. In the case of Mr. Abbott, the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections reported the resolution himself, and also in the case of Mr. Hart, and they passed nem. con., nobody objecting.

Mr. THURMAN. My friend from Nevada is entirely mistaken. In the case of General Abbott and in every case but one the facts found by the committee where there was a contest settled the question; but there was one case that was an exception to that, a case where there was no contest at all, but where the question was whether the pay of the Senator should commence at a day anterior to that which he had drawn. That was the case of Mr. Vickers, of Maryland, but that was not a contested case.

I have only to say in reference to this matter that I had occasion frequently to examine it when I was a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and also a member of the Committee on the Judiciary prior to the creation of the Committee on Privileges and Elections; and the precedents are unbroken in favor of the allowance in a case like this. If there is anything wrong in that, let us change it, but do not make the rule retrospective; do not begin with this gentleman who certainly came in as good faith as any man could come asserting his right to a seat in this Senate and was supported by a portion of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and by a respectable number of the Senate who believed in his right. Do not let us undertake to make any new rule to operate retrospectively in his case. If there is anything wrong in the precedent which has heretofore existed, that will be open to correction by a rule that shall operate in the future. I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. STEWART. I do not wish to be understood as desiring a new rule; but my inquiry was as to whether there were facts sufficient on the record to show that this is within the rule.

Mr. THURMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MORTON. I ask to have the question stated as it now stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, to pay $6,500.

Mr. MORTON. I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, which I understand is the present rate of compensation. I shall do it upon the ground of an unbroken line of precedent on that subject. If the precedent is not right, that is another question. The contest was made in this case by Mr. Sykes, and I have no reason to doubt that it was made in good faith. I believe he was advised by able lawyers that the law was with him. The case was argued at great length before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the parties were at heavy expense, I have no doubt, and much labor in preparing for the contest. To me the right of Mr. Spencer to the seat was very clear; but I am far from saying that there was not a fair ground for contest. I think there was quite as fair ground for a contest as there has been in some other cases before this body in which compensation was made. I cannot therefore consent to make an exception, so far as I am concerned, of Mr. Sykes from the operation of the ordinary rule. I have the resolution which passed in regard to Mr. Abbott in his contest for the seat from North Carolina before me:

Resolved, That Joseph C. Abbott, late contestant for a seat in this body from the State of North Carolina, be allowed the salary of a Senator from the 4th of March, 1871, up to the 23d of April, 1872, and one mileage each way.

I believe that resolution passed the Senate unanimously, and I think this is as fair a case for compensation as that was, and as two or three other cases that have occurred since I have been in the Senate were. I shall therefore vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, that being the lowest rate of regular compensation paid to Senators.

Mr. ALCORN. I shall vote as the Senator from Indiana indicated that he would, to pay Mr. Sykes the lowest legal compensation or rate paid a Senator during the time he was claiming a seat in this body. I contend that there is no other rule by which we can be governed in our action in these cases than that of the compensation allowed Senators. I was a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections that investigated this case. I did not have the pleasure of listening to all the testimony; but I listened to a large portion of it, and I hastily glanced over the rest of the testimony that was taken when I was compelled to be absent, and I am free to say that I have never seen a contested election case before the Senate so well balanced as was the case involved in this issue. I know the fact that many members who signed the majority report wavered for a long time in their judgment as to how the justice of the case demanded that they should go, and I know that when some of them did yield their assent to the report, it was with some misgivings as to the correctness as to the judgment formed, so evenly was the case balanced.

Now, sir, it is contended that if we adopt this resolution and vote this compensation, it will throw out an inducement for future contested-election cases. Well, sir, let the inducement, if you please, be thrown out. Are there not compensations that the Government receives for the payment of sums of money like this? Is it not through this means that the elective franchise is kept pure in the different States of the Union? How can we ever expect to have a case come here, where an election in one of the States has been carried by fraud and corruption, if each and every aspirant for the place is required to bear his own expenses? Poor men could not make a contest before this body; they would not be able to make a contest; and the proof of the corruption that exists in different Legislatures or that is brought to bear in different Legislatures would never reach this fountain-head, and that corruption never would receive that castigation which the country can give it when it is brought forward and exposed here.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Will he be good enough to state why it is that a contestant—I mean by that the claimant who ultimately is found not entitled to the seat—should be paid his expenses not only, but compensation as if he had served, when the claimant who turns out to be entitled to the seat is compelled to bear his own expenses, receiving no more for his compensation than he would have done had no contest been made?

Mr. ALCORN. I will answer that with due deference to the suggestion, and I think most triumphantly. I listened the other day with amazement when the Senator from New York propounded this same question to the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] Why, sir, the reasons are apparent. They need only be stated, and the answer is complete. The contestant is here claiming a seat. If he is defeated, he goes hence with the costs to pay; and he leaves the successful contestant in the seat, safely intrenched for six years. He has around him the panoply of office; he is entitled to his mileage; he is entitled to his pay while the contest is going on, receives his compensation while the contest is going on; and it is only his misfortune that he is compelled to take out of that mileage and that per diem or per annum payment a share of that which the Government gives him in order to vindicate and establish his right before the world to the seat which he comes here to demand and hold.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him once more?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the Senator would state in that connection, as I think it is a part one way or the other of his argument, whether in his opinion or within his knowledge, for I think he must have knowledge on that subject, Senators are so paid now that they have anything beyond the compensation for their services or even beyond their actual maintenance to take out at the rate of four or five thousand dollars to pay for other expenses? He says that the man to whom the seat is awarded is left panoplied by office; that he has his salary, and from that salary he can pay all these expenses. Now, I ask the Senator whether it is true that there is any such surplus or excess of salary; whether there is $4,000 or a penny applicable to the costs of a contest included in the pay which a Senator gets?

Mr. ALCORN. I do not propose to be led off from the question before us. I shall ask that this vote be taken before the morning hour expires; and the Senator from New York will excuse me for declining to be drawn off into a discussion of collateral issues not really involved in this case. But I will say that so far as the honorable Senator is concerned he is as capable of answering that question as I am. I believe he was one of the Senators who were made by the public press of this country and by the clamor of the people to declare here in the Senate that $5,000 was a sufficient compensation for a Senator. I was one of the men who voted for what is called the "salary grab." I was one of the men who stood here to vindicate that vote before the country and before the world, and no amount of clamor could ever cause me to go back upon a record that I had made myself.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope my friend will allow me to correct him twice.

Mr. ALCORN. I shall be glad to be corrected, if I am wrong.

Mr. CONKLING. In the first place, I was never, in the instance he cites or in any other instance that I know of, compelled by the clamor of the newspaper press to vote for anything which I would not have voted for otherwise; and I give the Senator my word that whenever I shall be compelled by that clamor to cast my vote for or against any measure, I will leave the Senate knowing that I am no longer worthy to meet men who profess to act upon their oaths.

In the next place, I have to say to the Senator that I never declared that I considered $5,000 an adequate compensation for a Senator. I did vote against increasing the pay, and I did vote to repeal the bill by which the pay was increased; but I never did say that $5,000 was in my judgment an adequate compensation upon the doctrine of equivalents for the services and expenses to which a Senator is put.

Mr. ALCORN. Then the Senator now having injected his defense before the country into my speech, stands fully vindicated, and as I have no especial interest, except that interest which friendship prompts, in the reputation of the honorable Senator, I leave the case just there, and come back now to the case before us, and state that so far as the contestant in this case is concerned, he is entitled to this pay by all the precedents, by all the rules and examples that have ever been established in the Senate and in Congress, and I ask that no exception shall be made in this particular case. And now, sir, in order that the vote may be taken before the expiration of the morning hour, I will say no more upon the subject.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) I entirely agree with the Senator from Mississippi that this was a bona fide contest. and that this man ought to be indemnified. The Senator says the only rule of indemnification is the salary. That seems to me to be a very strange proposition. There may be a case in which a man's expenses are not one-fourth what his salary would be. There may be a case in which his actual expenses are five times as great as his salary would be. Suppose this contest had been determined in the first days of this Congress; suppose he had come here and brought his witnesses from Alabama and brought his counsel from Alabama, as I believe he did do, and very able counsel too, and the whole matter had been disposed of within ten days after the commencement of the session, would the Senator from Mississippi say that the salary for ten days was a sufficient compensation or indemnity to him for that contest? Certainly not.

Mr. ALCORN. But he has the prospect of the salary for six years to come, and then he has vindicated himself before the country.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Sykes has the prospect of the salary for six years to come?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then I am opposed to granting him any extra allowance.

Mr. ALCORN. I mean the successful candidate.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am not talking about him.

Mr. ALCORN. Then I misapprehended the Senator.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am talking about the man who was not successful. I am talking about Mr. Sykes. Suppose he had come here and brought his counsel from Alabama and his case had been disposed of within ten days after he claimed to be entitled to a seat, for instance on the 14th of March, 1873, instead of being put by for a year before being disposed of, then his compensation would have been ten days' salary. Would the Senator say that that was a sufficient indemnity to him? Certainly not. It would be no indemnity at all. On the other hand, where the contest is decided at the heels of six years, and it may run to the end of the term nearly, and where the contest may not have cost him $1,000, it would be absurd to give him the salary of six years, which would be $30,000. I say the salary is no guide whatever. I say we should give Mr. Sykes what will fairly indemnify him, and I want to do that. If $3,000 will not do it, I am willing to put it high enough to make it compensate him. If $6,500, or $7,000, or $8,000, or $10,000 is necessary for that purpose, I will vote for that sum. The principle of the thing is that this man having made a bona fide contest should be idemnified. The question of what his salary would be has nothing whatever to do with that question. If his expenses have amounted to $6,500, that is the proper sum to pay him. If they have amounted to $10,000, that is the proper sum to pay him. On the other hand, if they have not exceeded $3,000, $3,000 is the proper sum to pay him, and the question of salary has nothing whatever to do with it. It is no guide whatever on the subject.

Mr. MORTON. I think my friend from Wisconsin is a little mistaken about that, so far as the practice is concerned. In the case of Mr. Abbott, to which I referred a few moments ago, the rule of compensation was the salary, and I do not know of any other.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the Senator will pardon me a moment; when I spoke on this subject the other day I commenced by saying that the resolution as reported by the committee was strictly according to the precedents, but that, in my judgment, the precedents were all wrong, and that we ought to establish a proper rule now and adhere to it hereafter.

Mr. MORTON. I do not know of any case in which there has been any calculation made of expenses and compensation fixed upon that principle. I think the uniform practice has been to give an allowance simply by way of salary.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suppose it is a foregone conclusion that this resolution in some form will pass—that is to say, in view of the precedents which have been uniformly established in this Chamber, the Senate will no doubt determine at this time to allow this contestant something—either $3,000, or $4,500, or $6,500, or some sum will be allowed. I do not propose to vote for any sum whatever; but before

I refer to that I wish to say one word upon the question of the measure of the rule that should be adopted if we allow anything.

I entirely agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that if this person is to be allowed anything it should be his expenses, and we should adopt some means of arriving at what those expenses were. It seems to me there is no answer that can possibly be given to the proposition stated by him last and the case that he presented as an illustration of where we should run to if we adopt any other rule; for if the rule is that the compensation shall be that which a Senator is entitled to as salary, then it would follow that if his expenses were $10,000 and the matter was determined the next day after the Senate met we should have to allow him but one day's pay. If this person is to be allowed anything, I think the fair and equitable rules is the one suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

It is said, however, in answer to that, that the precedents are all the other way, and it is insisted by the Senator from Ohio that if we are to establish any other precedent we should not apply it to this case. We must apply it to this case or some other one that comes up, and it will be just as hard and unjust on the next person who may come or the one after him as to apply it to this case. It may be said that we should establish a rule now that shall be applicable to future cases, but I say we can apply it to this case just as well as to any other that comes up.

But for myself I am opposed to paying anything, and for the reason that if a person comes here claiming a seat I think he should stand just like a person who makes a claim to any goods that he insists are his, and coming here making his claim if he fails, then the failure is his, and the people ought not to pay his expenses for making that claim. I know of no reason why inducements should be held out to persons to make contests for seats in this body and in the other House, contests whether with or without good ground, and if unsuccessful the Senate, having determined the question as they believe to be right and the other House having determined as they believe to be right, carrying out what they believe to have been the will of the people if there was a popular election, or carrying out what they believe to be the law if it was an election by a Legislature, I know of no reason why the unsuccessful man should have compensation. There is no ground for it in the reason of things, and no ground for it at all except in the single fact of precedents. I say it is time that we should depart from those precedents, and they are More honored in the breach, than in the observance.

All along the past few years we find that in this body and in the other House the contested-election cases have been increasing with wonderful rapidity. The number is tenfold now what it was fifteen or twenty years ago. A man is perfectly safe in making a contest because he can remain here, and if he has the compensation allowed a member of this body or of the other House he is losing nothing, doing nothing for his constituents, another person holding the seat and discharging all the duties, and getting pay from the Treasury of the United States, and when the contest is decided against the contestant he also draws pay from the Treasury.

I know perfectly well that it is idle for me to talk thus, because this resolution will pass in some form; but I desire at this time to put myself on the record against all these allowances. I never have voted for any of them since I have been here, and I will not vote for any now or hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I would inquire whether the $3,500 includes salary as Senator or if it includes anything more than expenses?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands $3,500 is the salary of a Senator for the period involved at the present rate.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I should be very glad to pay this gentleman his expenses, but I do not feel like paying him the salary of a Senator.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. It is impossible to get at the expenses precisely, but this will comprehend the expenses as near as we can get at them.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, before this vote is taken I wish to say a word. We have heard some very novel ideas, novel to me at least, suggested this morning. The honorable Senator from Ohio thinks there is some injustice in our doing what is right because of precedents. I submit to him that that is a very extraordinary idea. Had there been a law or a rule which gave to Mr. Sykes a certain sum of money, there might be great objection in our legislating retroactively, although we have seen within a few hours in the Senate that there was no serious objection in the minds of many Senators to retroactive legislation where the effect was to change a law affecting private rights; but there is no law here, there is no rule of the Senate here. What is there? I submit to the Senator from Ohio that he assigns Mr. Sykes to a most uncomfortable position. He would have us suppose that Mr. Sykes entered upon this contest expecting to receive a certain modicum in the event of his failure. That is it, is it not? What does that imply, if it implies anything? That this gentleman did what he would not otherwise have done in view of expected remuneration. Is that true? Does this claimant present himself as one who sought this seat upon the ground and for the reason that failing to obtain it he would receive the same salary that the occupant of the seat by law is entitled to receive? I acquit Mr. Sykes of any such idea; but that is the implication involved in the argument.

Another Senator says that the precedents justify this. I had occasion the other day to refer to the precedents. I will not ask the Senate to hear me refer to them again; but one remark I will make. It is quite too late touching matters of the compensation of members of Congress to refer to precedents and stand upon them, if those precedents refute and defy common sense. When the Senate will stand upon the precedents which gave back pay to members; when the House will stand upon that unbroken current of authority which extends from the very morning of the Republic to the present hour without one ripple to break it, it will be time for us to talk about standing upon precedents in this case. When the Senate dare stand upon the precedent of appointing a committee to go out and inquire how much it costs a Senator to rent a house, to have a chaise, and to have so many persons in his employ, and a certain estate in life, and then fix a compensation accordingly, (for which there are precedents,) it will be high time to elevate ourselves upon the ramparts of precedent and say that we will vote from the Treasury a sum which in my judgment we have no right to vote, because our forefathers set up such an example.

Mr. President, the argument is this: "We find instances in which a certain wrong has been done in the past; ergo we must follow that example." The Senator from Wisconsin, with that clearness with which he does all such things, has stated the transparent fallacy upon any theory of paying a defeated contestant salary. Then we are to pay compensation. My honorable friend before me [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] says he would be willing to vote to pay his expenses. I submit to him that he can give that vote upon no ground except one which entitles Mr. SPENCER, the sitting member, to his expenses also. Can it be that I, elected to a seat and decided by the Senate to be entitled to it and bound to defend it against all comers, can be forced into a contest by a contestant, visited with costs and expenses which he imposes, and when in the end the Senate vindicates my right and affirms that it was my duty to resist this contest which he has forced upom me, am to be turned penniless away, and all his expenses are to be paid to the contestant? If that is done, put it upon that unmeaning something called precedent; shut your eyes and do it because somebody else did it; but do not call it reason, and do not call it, as my friend before me suggested, a fair recompense under the circumstances.

If Mr. Sykes is to be paid for transcribing testimony, for sending for the witnesses, and the other matters to which the Senator from Maryland referred, let us pay Mr. SPENCER also. That is fair; that is right; that holds out to every man entitled to a seat just the same inducement to maintain it that it holds out to his defeated competitor who has no title at all. Upon that we can stand in reason. Upon this resolution, I submit, we cannot stand at all, and therefore I shall vote against it, saying, as I said when it passed in review on another occasion, that not knowing Mr. Sykes personally I have not the slightest ill-will toward him; on the contrary I will vote to pay him anything that I would vote to pay any other man, assuming as I do, at least for the sake of the argument, that he came in good faith to contest this seat and that he did not come, having looked up the precedents, with the idea "heads I win, tails you lose;" "if I succeed I get the salary; if I fail I get the salary; and therefore I will go, and not because I believe I am entitled to the seat." I impute no such thing to this claimant; I believe such an imputation to be unjust; and if we are to pay him at all, let us pay him his expenses fairly and exactly and pay also the other man upon whom this contest was forced; and if this amendment prevails to pay to Mr. Sykes not only his expenses but more, I shall offer an amendment, unless some other Senator shall first propose it, to include also the sitting member in the award of recompense for expenses.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I think we can get a vote now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. We can vote on this case now, and it should be disposed of.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from New York gave notice of an amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. There will be no discussion about it, I apprehend. Let us see if we cannot get the vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will yield, reserving my right to call for the regular order at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending order will be laid aside informally, subject to call.

Mr. SHERMAN. If discussion ensues, I shall insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I mean, if I can, to have a wholesome precedent established now and not have another precedent piled on us——

Mr. SHERMAN. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I am sure there will not be another word said. The Senate understand the subject and can vote advisedly. I am sure the Senator from New York does not desire to consume time.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from New York says he desires to speak on the subject.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. No, not to speak.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Senators will see from the condition in which business is placed that I must stand by the bill which is the regular order. I must insist on it unless the Senate vote me down.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I certainly feel called on in this stage of the case to move to set aside the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the pending question on the bill regularly before the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Speaker had appointed Mr. THOMAS SWANN, of Maryland, a conferee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes, vice Mr. JOHN HANCOCK, of Texas, excused.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

A bill (H. R. No. 2909) to declare the bridge across the Niagara River, authorized by the act of Congress approved June 30, 1870, a post-route;

A bill (H. R. No. 3518) to amend the act entitled "An act to divide the State of Virginia into two judicial districts;"

A bill (H. R. No. 3539) to admit free of duty merchandise sunk for two years and afterward recovered;

A bill (H. R. No. 3664) to change the name of the schooner Alba; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3668) for the relief of Smith & Matthews, of Illinois.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 881) fixing the times of holding the circuit court of the United States in the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada;

A bill (H. R. No. 3237) to authorize the First National Bank of Seneca to change its name;

A bill (H. R. No. 3359) fixing the time for the election of Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania to the Forty-fourth Congress;

A bill (H. R. No. 735) to increase the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have been totally disabled;

A bill (H. R. No. 2453) to increase pensions in certain cases; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 107) providing for the termination of the treaty between the United States and His Majesty the King of the Belgians, concluded at Washington July 17, 1858.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CAMERON, and Mr. MORRILL of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, submitted amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works for rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with accompanying papers.

Mr. HOWE. I desire to give notice of an amendment which I propose to offer to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and I move its reference in the first instance to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

MOIETIES UNDER CUSTOMS LAWS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3171) to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will report the pending question.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, inserted the following amendment as a new section:

That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed; and that nothing herein contained shall affect existing rights of the United States.

It is proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to amend the amendment by striking out the words "of the United States" and inserting—

Or prevent a distribution in like manner as if this act had not been passed in all cases where prosecution has been actually commenced previous to May 1, 1874, or in anywise affect suits or actions commenced or forfeitures incurred previous to May 1, 1874.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon this amendment to the amendment the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. One or two Senators already have asked me the nature of this amendment, and before the roll-call proceeds, as the Senate Chamber was nearly vacated last night, I should like all Senators to understand the effect of it. The object of the amendment is to confine the operation of the moiety bill to the future and to such pending cases only as have been commenced since the 1st of May, 1874, not to legislate backward to affect cases some of which have been pending for years, and in many of which large expenses are pending and large advances have been made. The whole purpose of it is to avoid the injustice of interfering with existing rights and to make it speak forward as legislation ordinarily does, except that in its application to existing cases it shall apply only to those which have been commenced since the 1st of last May, the allegation being that frivolous or enterprising suits may have been commenced since with a view to forestall the action of Congress, as I understood.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) I shall vote for this amendment, and not having been upon the floor yesterday while the debate was proceeding, I desire to state in a very few words why I do so. The principal argument made against it was made by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH,] who said these men who had commenced suits and are by the present law entitled to a distribution of a portion of what shall be recovered, ought not to have it. If they ought not to have it, some good reason exists why they should not. The Senator felt called upon, evidently, to give some reason because they had commenced these proceedings under existing laws; and he therefore gave the reason, which was not that the law did not entitle them to it; not that they had brought the suits in bad faith; not that it would not be denying to them a right which the law promised them for services which they have actually performed; but upon the ground that they have become odious to the people. That is a ground upon which I certainly never could vindicate a vote that took away a man's rights. It has been said by the Great Master that it is a very easy thing to forgive a friend: but what He requires is to forgive an enemy. It is an easy thing to do justice to your friends, to do justice to popular favorites; but justice is due even to those who are odious to the people; and some better reason must be given for taking away from these men the rights which are now vested in them by existing laws than that they are odious to the people.

I shall, therefore, until I hear some reason to the contrary, vote for this amendment which will give to these men who have performed services precisely that compensation which the law promised them for rendering the services. If this bill is to be passed it should look to the future. Then it will be a question whether men will make any effort whatever to execute the law or not. If they do, it will be from generosity and patriotism; if they do not they get nothing. They get nothing in either event; and there is no wrong done to them, because every man knows in advance exactly what he is to do and what is to result from his doing a particular thing. But in this case to make this strike back is to do injustice as I think.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As I understand the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] it reserves all the rights of the Government of the United States, but the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] would also reserve the rights of informers and persons that share in moieties, as I understand the operation of his amendment. I concur with the Senator from New Hampshire that that class of men have rendered themselves justly odious to the country, and I do not propose by any vote of mine to aid them in any way.

Mr. CARPENTER. Allow me to interrupt my friend?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. Conceding that they have rendered themselves odious, is that a good foundation upon which we shall deny them a right?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I say, so far as I am concerned, no right which they claim to put their hands into the pockets of other men shall longer exist. They have no right under the guise of protecting this Government to become the robbers of private individuals, and by no vote of mine shall such a right be recognized or consummated. I do not intend by any vote of mine to be particeps criminis in their guilt. I do not intend to aid them in the least to put their hands into the pockets of other men, or extort from them money which they ought not to have. The men whom they propose to rob to a certain extent for their own benefit, have some rights as well as these informers, and I propose to protect that class of merchants against these men who have become vultures to prey upon them. I do not intend to put myself in the position of being suspected, at any rate by any vote which I give, of desiring to aid these men to accomplish their purposes.

Mr. CARPENTER. I desire to ask my friend from Delaware a question. He certainly does not understand the question I put to him first.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir; I understand it very well; but I will listen to the question of the Senator.

Mr. CARPENTER. The question is this: whether conceding these men to be odious will justify you and me in giving a vote which deprives them of an existing right; a right secured to them by existing laws?

Mr. SAULSBURY. So far as I am concerned, I would take away from them a right to prosecute what I conceive to be an improper action in order to put money in their own pockets.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is not the question. I would do that; but that is not the question here. The law as it stands declares that these men shall have a certain part of the recovery. That is a present right under the existing laws of Congress; not a vested right in the sense of being protected by the Constitution, but one of which we cannot in good faith deprive them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. What kind of a right, let me ask the Senator from Wisconsin, have they? Is there any money now adjudged to belong to them? Is there any money now determined by the judgment of a court to belong to them? They have simply become prosecutors in order that they may obtain, under judgments which may be recovered, a moiety of the proceeds. It may be that in these very suits they will recover nothing; and therefore I cannot see that they have a single vested right. Besides, the vested rights of informers is a new doctrine to advance in the Senate. If they have any rights in the suits, they are imperfect, not vested rights.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator only confirms what was said by the Senator from New Hampshire, that these men have become odious. It seems they have become odious not only to the people, but also to the Senator from Delaware. That may all be. I am not contesting that. But take a case; and that is the precise point to which I am trying to bring his mind, because if such a thing can be done honestly, I would be as fond of doing what would make myself popular as he would. If I could do it fairly and honestly, I would vote anything that would make me as popular as the Senator from Delaware is. The point that I want information upon is this: By the law as it now exists these men are entitled to a certain amount of money out of the recovery in these cases, if there shall be a recovery. Now can we honestly—I mean honestly in the legislative sense—can we fairly and justly take away that right which now exists by law in regard to the cases now pending, in which the services have already been rendered and the money advanced and expended by these odious men? No matter how odious they may be, they are entitled to demand justice. The murderer with blood on his garments, the beggar even is entitled to demand of his king justice; and I ask the Senator from Delaware if he can vindicate, or if I can be justified in voting to deprive these men of an existing legal right because they have become odious to him or to me or to the people, or to all of us?

Mr. SAULSBURY. So far as the insinuation of the Senator that I am governed by any desire to promote my popularity is concerned, I deem that unnecessary of reply. I trust that I always have the courage at least to do my duty without reference to whether it may affect my individual popularity with informers or anybody else. I profess to act in this Senate from a sense of my duty, and not with reference to outside views that may be taken of my action by other people. I am not wholly indifferent to the public voice of the country in reference to my action. I would be glad to have my votes correspond at all times with the just wish of the people of this country. I tell the Senator from Wisconsin that in this matter, however, I seek not the applause of anybody, but I trust that I have the disposition at least to do my duty and to face the frowns of these informers, whose schemes shall not, so far as my vote at least is concerned, be accomplished.

Now, sir, so far as these men have any rights at all, I am told they are properly provided for in this bill by an application to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CARPENTER. Not at all; no provision whatever is made.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But I deny that they have any vested rights in the suits that may have been commenced. The facts are, I have no question from the intimation I have heard here, that suits have been commenced in anticipation that the Congress of the United States would take hold of this abominable moiety business and repeal the law under which their proceedings have been commenced. In that view, knowing that the law was to be repealed by this Congress, these gentlemen, as I am informed, have instituted suits, and now they come and talk about vested rights! Sir, they have about the rights of the vulture to the lamb. They would enrich themselves by taking money from the pockets of other people. I do not propose to aid them.

I am willing to protect all the rights of the Government of the United States, and so far as those rights are concerned the amendment offered yesterday by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] and adopted by the Senate does preserve every right of the Government of the United States. The amendment offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] if I understand it properly, is simply to preserve the rights of these informers and not of the Government. Therefore while I voted for the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, being anxious to protect all the rights of the Government under which I live, I am not here to protect the rights of informers by voting for the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to ask him one question more?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. Suppose that Congress should pass a bill here in the case of some gross terrible murder, say of the President of the United States or somebody else, offering a reward of $5,000 or $25,000 to the persons who should furnish the testimony upon which the guilty party should be convicted, and the testimony should be furnished and the guilty party should be in process of trial, would it be honest for Congress, pending that trial, to pass a bill repealing the law which made the offer of reward to the informers upon the ground that all informers are infamous and odious and cannot have any vested rights? Would that be honest?

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is a very different case, and the Senator from Wisconsin knows it as well as anybody else, from that which we have before us. But even in that case, if a party secured the passage of the law authorizing the proclamation of the reward in order that he might put money in his pocket, in order that he might derive benefit from it, and for no other purpose, just as these men procured the enactment of a law under which they now propose to operate, I for one, should be very likely to say that they ought not to profit by their own improper acts.

Mr. WADLEIGH. My friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, ingeniously misrepresents what I said yesterday upon this matter. It is true I said that these informers had made themselves odious to the people of this country. It is true that I stated that to be the fact; and it is a fact which every member of this body knows himself; but I did not urge that as the reason why the amendment offered by me should be adopted and the amendment offered by the Senator from New York should be rejected. The reason is that these men have so conducted themselves as that they have made themselves justly odious and open to the aroused indignation of the people of the United States. It is on account of their conduct, on account of the way in which they have conducted, and the manner in which they have conducted themselves that has made them so odious that I object to their continuing longer the recipients of such favors as they have had under the laws of the United States.

The amendment of the Senator from New York proposes to give these men further moieties. He proposes to give them moieties in suits recently commenced by them and to be commenced before the passage of this bill, when they knew when those suits were brought that this law was to be repealed, and those suits were brought at that time for the purpose of obtaining moieties under a law which they knew would soon be repealed.

Mr. President, as to this matter of vested rights there is nothing in it. Every informer, every spy who has disgraced the American name within the last year knew that Congress had power to repeal this law whenever it saw fit. They went into these disgraceful operations with that knowledge, and it is no injustice to them when Congress comes up and repeals that law, as they well knew it had the right to do.

I know that there are Senators upon this floor who affect a supreme contempt for that public opinion by virtue of which we all hold our seats here. I know it is a little fashionable in the Senate for members of the Senate to assert their superiority to that people whose representatives they are and to that public opinion which is the most powerful force in the world at this time. But, Mr. President, all wise statesmen, all wise politicians legislate with a view to public opinion. Legislation without regard to public opinion is vicious legislation, and I consider it not derogatory to me in my legislation here to consider the state of that public opinion which controls affairs in this country. I consider it to be the duty of the Senate, the duty of Congress to legislate with a view to it and with due regard to it.

I did not proceed to state yesterday the particular acts which had made these gentlemen, who have made so much money out of the people of the United States, so odious. That statement had been sufficiently made by the Senators from Pennsylvania who had preceded me, and I deemed it unnecessary to say one word on that subject. Their proceedings have all become a matter of record. Their proceedings are all known to the people of this country, and have awakened in the breasts of the people of this country an indignation against the manner in which they have conducted themselves. They have brought disgrace upon the American name; and I did not expect that a motion or a proposition would be entertained in this body which would enable them to perpetuate and to further carry on the proceedings which they have been carrying on for the past year.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to inquire who these fellows are who have disgraced the American name?

Mr. WADLEIGH. The Senator from Wisconsin well knows who they are.

Mr. HOWE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The Senator from Wisconsin is not so ignorant and is not so unversed in public affairs as not to have heard of Jayne and his coadjutors. The Senator from Wisconsin must have heard the statements of the Senators from Pennsylvania as to the manner in which this man Jayne and his coadjutors had conducted themselves.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator pardon me for interrupting him?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. I did not hear anything about the way these gentlemen have conducted themselves from the Senators from Pennsylvania. I did not have the privilege of hearing what the Senators from Pennsylvania said. I confess I have heard the name of Jayne. It would not be literally true to say that I had not heard anything else, for I have heard something else. What is the matter with Jayne?

Mr. WADLEIGH. If the Senator from Wisconsin is so ignorant as he professes to be, I advise him to read the report made by the Committee on Ways and Means in the House of Representatives and to read the record of what was said here yesterday. I do not propose here to-day to go into a recapitulation of the evidence produced before the Committee on Ways and Means, or to reiterate here what was so well said by the Senators from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOWE. I am precisely as ignorant as I pretend. There is a Senator on this floor drawing the full salary of a Senator of the United States. He knows things. I ask him to tell me. If Jayne is a miscreant, if he is an unwhipped felon, let us know it. If he has got coadjutors who ought to be in the penitentiary and are not, I want to know their names. I do not appear here to vouch for one man or the other; but I have heard this talk in a shadowy way about some people who have disgraced the American name. I have not come to feel any disgrace from any conduct outside of the Senate Chamber that I now remember, [laughter;] but I want to know what this conduct is which has disgraced us all.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The fact that the Senator from Wisconsin does not feel disgraced is simply owing to the ignorance which he confesses. If he will read up the record, if he will read up the evidence before the Committee on Ways and Means in the House, he will begin to feel a portion of that disgrace which no one who has read it can fail to feel.

Mr. HOWE. Is it quite kind for a Senator so well informed as my excellent friend from New Hampshire to parade an ignorance which is so humbly confessed as I confess my own? Does he fill the office of a Senator when he simply stands there at a salary of $5,000 a year to blackguard a colleague for his ignorance when in half the time he might dispel that ignorance? Why does he not make me as learned as he is himself, since he can do it so easily?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, so far as my friend from Wisconsin is concerned, if he has not informed himself in regard to these matters when there was so ample an opportunity to do so, I think he is at fault and he has not performed his duty to his constituents and his country. When he or any other gentleman asks me to get up in the Senate and to go on and instruct him, privately and personally, as to matters which have been fully put in evidence, matters which have been spread before Congress in the shape of evidence, and as to matters which have been discussed in the Senate, I do not feel called upon, and I feel entirely incompetent to take upon myself the office of instructor; and I hope my friend from Wisconsin will pardon me for declining so to do.

As to the munificent pay which I receive here, I do not think that I receive that pay for the purpose of instructing Senators as to matters concerning which they may fully inform themselves from the records of the Senate and from evidence in print for the use of Congress.

Mr. HOWE. My excellent friend from New Hampshire will not accept the office of schoolmaster. He will not undertake the labor of enlightening me. I commend his prudence, not his generosity. I am not so modest; I will undertake to enlighten him. I have heard of Jayne. I have never read the report of the Committee on Ways and Means. I doubt whether the honorable Senator from New Hampshire has. If he has, he knows it. If he has, he can probably recite it to us. I did not have on my desk yesterday that notable document. I read one fact out of it, and I am going to repeat it here and now. It was that that man Jayne in the employ of the United States had been instrumental in commencing fifty-nine suits against men charged with frauds upon the Treasury of the United States; that forty-eight of them had been prosecuted to judgment, and every one of them judgments against the parties accused. That is one piece of rascality recorded against this man Jayne. Is it that act which has brought disgrace upon the American people? What about the conduct of those forty-eight fellows who have been convicted by the judgment of the courts of this country? How do they stand as to the American name? Nay, how does it affect the character of the American people that in the Senate of the United States, where law is supposed to reside and where justice is supposed to reside, this debate has gone on day after day, and we have heard from lip after lip the most eloquent and vehement denunciation of the men who have revealed these rascalities, and not one single syllable of reproach against the rascals who have been exposed as committing them? How does that little fact affect the character of the American people? When I blush at all, I shall blush for the infamies practiced here, or I will not assume that I shall ever have any such occasion to blush.

But, Mr. President, I must confess that I have been a little sensitive concerning that peculiar kind of interest which I have seen manifested here day after day for public morals. Informers! Sir, let me now say once for all that I do not hold a man to be infamous above all men who simply finds a piece of rascality and exposes it to public judgment. I think the rascality is, on the whole, quite as deplorable as is the conduct of the man who exposes it and who brings it to judgment.

Sir, I do not know how I happened to say all these things. I asked in a respectful way to be informed what this conduct was and who these men were who had been denounced so repeatedly and so vehemently. I found myself in turn held up as an example, a melancholy example, of the ignorance which might creep into the Senate from time to time. Well, I knew all that before. I knew I was such an example. I have been here a great many years; I guess, on the whole, for the express purpose of furnishing that example. [Laughter.] I hope it will not be thrown away upon my illustrious friend from New Hampshire. We do not need another of the kind.

Mr. CARPENTER. I desire to say one word in reply to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator yield to me for one moment?

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. By unanimous consent, I believe for the third time, to-day was given to me for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. There is evidently a disposition here to discuss this question at length, and it is a very important one, and I do not like to interfere with the debate. Probably the Senate would not be in the humor to allow me to do it any way. But inasmuch as I see the only way for a man to secure the position that is assigned him by the Senate is to be here early in the morning, and stand here all the time calling the attention of the Chair to it at every moment, I will ask the unanimous consent of the Senate again to give me to-morrow for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Military Affairs. I have always yielded to the business before the Senate. If that consent is given, I shall make no further trouble; but if not, I shall antagonize everything that is brought forward.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that will be done. The Senator from Illinois has been crowded out twice with the business of his committee, and I certainly do not want to interfere with him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, at the expiration of the morning hour, the bills which have been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs be regarded as the unfinished business, to be called up by the Chair at that time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I feel justified in rising to call attention to the real question now pending before us involved in this amendment, because of the reference made by the Senator from New Hampshire to what has been said by the Senators from Pennsylvania. I concur with him in the denunciation of any man who uses his office for the purpose of oppression; but, sir, let us look at the intention of the amendment reported by the committee and how it is affected by what is now proposed to be done.

Since 1794 or 1795, I believe, a law has been upon the statute-book which allowed moieties to informers and to other officers of the customs. Numerous suits are brought, not simply in New York where Mr. Jayne operated as the special agent, not simply in Boston, but in every collection district in the United States. All along the lake border, all along the Atlantic coast and on the Pacific coasts, suits have been brought for the purpose of enforcing the forfeitures and the moieties incurred under these laws. The Committee on Finance reported a provision—

> That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed; that nothing herein contained shall affect existing rights or prevent a distribution in like manner as if this act had not been passed in all cases where prosecution has been actually commenced.

Now, the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire has in effect stricken from the record, so far as all these parties are concerned, all the suits that are pending in all these districts for all causes of action that have accrued to any of the informers, to any of the collectors, naval officers, or surveyors, and he seeks to do that because one agent has become odious. As I have already said, I will agree with him in denouncing whatever that man has done that is unwarranted by his office; but I shall also agree with the Senator from Wisconsin in the sentiment that all the special agents who have been in the service of the Government are neither saints nor sinners any more than are all the importing merchants who have business in the custom-houses. There are both classes among both officers and merchants; and the fact that such classes existed brought into operation the law of 1795, if that is the correct date, and has kept such laws upon the statute-book down to the present hour.

The plain question presented is, Shall we cut up all such actions because some one or two of them may inure to the benefit of agents who have improperly exercised the duties of their office? The Finance Committee thought not, and therefore they reported this amendment saving all pending actions.

The Senator from New York offered an amendment because of revelations made that actions were instituted for the purpose of recovering penalties which have in effect been denounced by the provisions of this bill, and to meet such cases and cut out actions for that purpose his amendment excluded all actions brought since the 1st of May, 1874. The Senate adopted that amendment; but upon the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] it was subsequently stricken out. It is now renewed. While I am here to join with the Senator from New Hampshire in denouncing men who use their offices as a cloak for oppression or for exacting money; while I am here to sympathize with the merchant who may have been the victim of such arbitrary oppression, but not to sympathize with the merchant who seeks to defraud the revenue and who is just as worthy of denunciation as the officer who abuses his office; while I am here in this light, I cannot agree to an amendment which will cut up all the rights in all the actions pending in all the collection districts of the United States, simply because one officer may have become odious in the administration of his duties. I think, without any heat or passion about this matter, but looking at it dispassionately as a matter of justice, the amendment offered by the Senator from New York is in the right direction and in the direction usually adopted in legislation of this character, to save existing rights.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I feel compelled to say a few words in consequence of the reference which has been made to remarks made by my colleague and myself. I have not changed my opinion in regard to the infamous character of those men who have been charged by the public with doing injustice to our merchants. I think the whole system of employing spies and all the bad people in their train is one of the worst features of our later history. The American people have always looked with horror upon a set of men who are paid to go around quietly and give information against their neighbors, as these men have done. But you cannot collect your revenue unless you have informers of some kind, and I would leave that whole duty to be performed by the regularly appointed officers of the customs. Ever since the Government has been in existence the custom-house officers have had inducements held out to them to make them more active and more strict in the discharge of their duties. Their pay has been, in a great measure, regulated in that way. For instance, in the city of New York and the larger cities, they have always had very large fees because of the amount of frauds practiced there. In the city of Philadelphia they have always had fees, and I think those fees should remain.

But the law of Congress which enabled those whose names have been so notorious lately to go around, in opposition to the duties of the regular officers of the revenue, ought to be repealed, and they ought to be censured and punished. For instance, Mr. Sanborn, of whom we have heard so much, or one of his deputies, went to the supervisor of the revenue at Philadelphia and desired him to give him possession of his books. The supervisor replied "No; that is a portion of my duty; I can collect the revenues here, and I will collect them." So well did Mr. Tutton perform his duties that a committee of the House who had the matter under examination complimented him for the faithful manner in which he had performed his duties. But that is not the question before the Senate now, as I understand. It is whether all the suits which have been brought for the purpose of recovering what is due to the Treasury shall be at once abandoned.

Mr. WADLEIGH. No; to keep the suits.

Mr. CAMERON. You do not pay the officers or allow them to get their pay.

Mr. WADLEIGH. They do not get their halves.

Mr. CAMERON. I think the amendment of the Senator from New York is only just and fair; and while I still believe in all I have said in regard to the infamy of this system which has lately grown up, I desire that justice shall be done. While I am opposed to oppressing the merchants, I am well aware that we must protect the revenue.

Mr. MORTON. I gave notice last night that this morning I would ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the currency bill. I dislike to interfere with the progress of the bill before the Senate; and before making any motion I will ask the Senate to give consent that this bill may be laid aside informally to proceed with the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator that it is an economy of time to finish this and then take up that. We certainly lose time I think by these laying-asides and then starting afresh, for we all get so many new ideas on the old thing that we have to express them when it is taken up again. I suggest as an economy of time that we dispose of the moiety question and then take up the other.

Mr. SHERMAN. If Senators will only confine debate to the pending question on this moiety bill, it is nearly finished; it has been reported to the Senate; all the amendments of the Committee of the Whole have been concurred in except this; this is the last one. I have no objection to the proposition of the Senator from Indiana if it does not displace this bill as the unfinished business; but if it does I shall undoubtedly call for a division to test the sense of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think in economy I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. MORTON. I do not make any motion now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SARGENT. Those who guard the flock are never popular with those who depredate upon it. I am not at all astonished at the clamor which is raised in certain quarters for the passage of this bill. I am very glad, as the best means of information, that the Chamber of Commerce of New York have sent us their manifesto giving the reasons why they desire the passage of the bill. I have nothing to say against the mercantile class, as a class. I do not doubt that there are thousands of honest merchants who have no desire to defraud the revenue, no desire to take any advantage of the Government of the United States, and for such men I do not believe the moiety system has ever been a disadvantage or has ever worked to their injury.

I find in this document, which was printed the day before yesterday, that the purpose of this bill is among other things to "hush the voice of the detective." They earnestly desire that the Senate of the United States shall pass a bill "which has passed the House without a dissenting voice," in other words, without a discussion, on the high wave of public clamor, because by the bill they say "the voice of the detective will be hushed." I do not wish to hush the voice of the detective. I desire that the detective shall probe into all frauds and all crimes, and I do not think that the profession of detective is per se dishonorable or corrupt. I do not believe that the United States in guarding its Treasury, in protecting the sources of its revenue, should be deprived of those means which all civilization uses to detect crime and protect itself against fraud. In this paper, written by the advocates of this bill, they propose that "bribes shall not be offered to the employé to set a trap for the innocent employer." The clerk is to set a trap into which the unsophisticated employer may walk! Do you believe that the merchant, controlling his business, does not know whether there is intentional fraud or not on the Treasury of the United States? Whether when a man is sent abroad and paid there to send false invoices the firm employing him does not know the mission of that man and the amount of service he is to perform and the work which he performs?

"Nor treachery among clerks to be exalted into an occasion for the bestowal of fortune and office at the hands of the Government." To paraphrase it, the Government shall not offer rewards to those who shall point the attention of the Government to cases of false invoices; and where a clerk knows that an invoice is given at the custom-house and is that upon which duties are settled, but that a false, fraudulent, and secret invoice is upon the merchant's books, and the Government is not to have the benefit of that information if it costs it any money; it is not to reward any information which may be received from sources of this kind. Is there any court in Christendom or any legislation which would prohibit the use of information thus acquired to ferret out crimes of other trades, of other character? You take away any stimulus whatever to the clerk or any other employé of a merchant who knows of the facts from the very necessity of his employment, who knows that frauds are being committed on the Government, and of course they will not be revealed and the Government Treasury will suffer.

Revenue laws are from their very nature unpopular; they are most stringently construed, and should be. They are hedged about in every direction in order to be most effective, and should be in order that revenue be brought into the Treasury. If you relax them here and there, your Treasury suffers in just the proportion that you relax these laws, and if ingenuity could discover something that could be applied more effectually toward the honest collection of the revenue, the Treasury would gain by it and public morals would gain by it. But where you relax in this direction, where you discard the means of detection which are used to ferret any other crime, and which are more necessary in the protection of the revenue than in any other case, there your Treasury suffers, and there the honest merchant and public morals suffer.

They go on after stating this and say:

> The voice of the detective shall be hushed.

The Government is not to have a corps of detectives either public or private; at any rate they so hope if this bill passes. Furthermore they say:

> That the sacredness of all correspondence shall again become inviolable, and alleged offenders shall not perforce convict themselves out of their own mouths.

That which is written or spoken by the person himself and clearly proved (and it is always proved clearly when in writing where the handwriting or signature is proved) is the very best testimony, because no man will testify against his own interest; and the same rule which allows documents authentic in their character to be produced in these cases is applied to all criminal cases, and it is legitimate evidence and evidence of the highest character, as laid down by all the writers upon evidence, wherever a person knowing the facts speaks against his own interest, there the truth is told.

Furthermore we are told that they are "not perforce to convict themselves out of their own mouths, nor out of their own books and papers." If on the ledger or invoice-book there shall be entered a single invoice which in itself is clear and conclusive proof that the Government has been defrauded of thousands and thousands of dollars, and that there is the testimony right under the hands of the Government by which conviction of a gross outrageous fraud, by which the Treasury has suffered, by which honest merchants have suffered, by which public morals have been damaged, can be secured, that evidence is not to be produced in court. And acting upon the demand of these gentlemen the Senate themselves have refused to accept the amendment of the committee by which the books in the discretion of the court, upon an order made by the court after a hearing that these books might be produced. That section has been stricken out of the bill.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] suggests that we shall have another vote on that. I trust we may have another vote on that, and that we may have this best of all evidence produced, not capriciously produced, not from mere motives of curiosity, but upon the order of the court in a judicial proceeding, its attention being called to it and the evidence why the books should be produced being fairly rendered before it.

I say with this document in our hands showing that the purpose is to strip the Treasury of all guards, to prevent it from using detectives of any kind which experience in all such cases shows to be absolutely necessary, you necessarily stab at your revenue and you stab at public virtue and you stab at mercantile honor, because to compete with dishonor dishonor must be used and the honest merchant can no longer maintain himself in his honorable course provided the Government does not take the means which shall detect and punish the dishonest merchant who does business by his side.

The pending amendment of the Senator from New York is just merely on the general principles I have stated in that it would save the past, but it is just for the further reason that there are in every collection district of the United States suits of exactly the character contemplated by this amendment, suits brought not under the special legislation passed a year or so ago and which might be improvident, and which if repealed would avoid all reasonable cause for any clamor that has been raised about this matter, but suits under your ancient laws where rights have grown up and evidence has been collected at some difficulty; perhaps the suits may be now going to judgment; and all the advantage of the labor which has been employed by honest men, not under exceptional laws, is thrown away, provided the amendment of the Senator from New York is not adopted.

I do not believe that that is just or right. I do think these rights should be reserved. If you want to make this apply to Jayne or to any other man or to any particular class of cases, say so boldly in your legislation; but do not make it apply to other cases where it would be unjust. Let us say that suits commenced under the act of a year ago, which Senators have fresh in their minds, shall not be prosecuted, and that there shall be no new moieties made in the case of judgments if that is thought to be best; but under the ancient laws the suits which are pending, which are not affected by that legislation, which are not tainted in any particular, it seems to me ought to be excepted in justice.

I do not believe that my judgment will sanction this bill so far that I can vote for it. I believe that a year from now we shall find by a depleted Treasury, although the parties who send such circulars as this or some of them may rejoice, although many may go unscathed of punishment if detectives be unused, the public Treasury will so badly suffer that we shall be compelled either to increase our taxes or to repeal the legislation which we are putting through the two Houses with so much haste. I look with some forebodings upon the result to our Treasury, and I do think that this bill is too broad and far-reaching; that it takes away too many safeguards for the honest collection of the revenue.

Mr. STEWART. I was unfortunately out when the consideration of this bill was commenced, and I have had no opportunity in consequence of other business to investigate it carefully; but certainly it is an exceedingly dangerous bill. I think it had better not be passed. The twelfth section of the amended bill has nothing to do with your informers or detectives but is a matter as to the collection of the revenue, and it is such an innovation as is absolutely dangerous; and with that section in I cannot vote for the bill. By existing laws—and I will not go into details—if a person fraudulently, with intent to defraud the Government of the United States, puts in a false invoice, he is subject not only to fines and penalties, but to imprisonment and the confiscation of the entire invoice, and the law has been so for very many years. That is one of the ancient laws in connection with the collection of the revenue.

Now, I call attention to the twelfth section of this bill. What does it do? For a fraudulent invoice made with fraudulent design, what is the penalty under this? Not an innocent mistake, but I am speaking of a fraudulent invoice as named in this twelfth section; and what is the penalty? The penalty is a fine not to exceed $5,000. How enforced? In your criminal courts? No; but by an action at law in a United States court. What else? The party shall forfeit only the particular item to which the fraud relates.

If that does not make smuggling by false invoices a pretty safe business, I am not a judge of the language used here. It wipes out pains and penalties of imprisonment in connection with smuggling in this way. It has nothing to do with the business of honest mistakes as referred to in this protest. The New York Chamber of Commerce say in this memorial from which the Senator from California read that under this bill "innocent mistakes and willful frauds shall not be punished alike, nor technical errors arising under obscure laws subject the entire invoice and whole cargoes to confiscation." "Technical errors arising under obscure laws!" Although they approve this bill and ask for its passage they do not put themselves on record, and I do not believe they so intend, that a fraudulent invoice made with fraudulent intent shall not be punished except by the loss of the particular item in which the fraud is detected, and only an action at law for the recovery of the penalty afforded as a remedy. I do not believe that any honest merchant will make such a proposition as this or desire any such law passed. Let me read this section; it relates to the main body of importations that go through the custom-house:

That any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make, or attempt to make, any entry of imported merchandise, by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or who shall be guilty of any willful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by such act or omission, shall severally forfeit and pay a fine of not more than $5,000 for each offense, to be recovered by [a joint or several actions] an action in the name of the United States, in any district or circuit court of the United States.

Then, if you do not happen to have something that you can levy execution upon, he is entirely exempt; there is no arrest; nothing but that you may sue him if you catch him, and what else may you do? They want to protect him particularly; "and in addition to such fine, such merchandise shall be forfeited." For fear that you might injure him too much, this qualifying clause follows: "which forfeiture shall only apply to the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged fraud relates," not to which the mistake, the technical error relates, but to which the fraud relates. Now in common dealings among mankind, fraud goes further than that. In contracts it forfeits everything. If this is not an act for the protection of fraudulent importers, I know not what it is. It does not name anybody else; the section only refers to persons who, with intent to defraud the revenue, make false entries, false invoices, false letters, and false affidavits, and do it knowingly and willfully with intent to defraud the revenue; and they are to be protected! This section does not relate to mistakes or technical errors; it relates to those who are described in the section itself to be fraudulent importers; and it says they shall go scot-free with the exception of an action to recover not to exceed $5,000, although the revenue may have been defrauded out of millions by the same practices, and the confiscation of the particular item upon which they are caught, although they may have imported tens of millions in the same way without being caught. If that is not a bounty to fraud, if that is not in the interest of fraudulent importers and not honest importers, then I have not the ingenuity to imagine a setion that could be drawn in their behalf.

I do not believe the section is understood by the Finance Committee or anybody else. I do not believe the Finance Committee are prepared to say here that persons may go on and defraud the revenue ad libitum, and the only consequence that shall overtake them shall be an action for $5,000 penalty, or less if the judge may so decide, and the forfeiture of the particular item on which they have been caught. The great mass of the items in which frauds have been committed may have gone into consumption, the disclosing of this particular fraud accidentally may show the trick by which a fraudulent merchant has been for years persistently preying on your revenue, and still if he with fraudulent intent has imported goods, all further remedy is gone and there is nothing but your action left, for this is the last law superseding all others on this question of fraudulent invoices. It seems to me that strikes deeper at existing laws than is intended by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALCORN. I do not represent a mercantile community, Mr. President, but an agricultural community exclusively. I certainly have no interest so far as merchants are concerned other than that interest which belongs to the country, and I should regret very much if I was seduced into the support of any measure here that would be detrimental to the interest of the country. I am prepared to hear argument on that point, and to listen to it, and to exercise my judgment as best I can upon every feature of this bill as it comes up.

I think there is great force in what the Senator from Nevada has said. I was impressed with his remarks yesterday and to-day upon that point; and when the question comes to the vote on the section to which he alludes, I shall be prepared then to give an earnest of my judgment upon that section, and shall demand of the Committee on Finance the reasons why they have reported the amendment as it is or the reasons why the section has been stricken out.

But I come now to the last section, and to the amendment offered to it by the Senator from New York, and I wish to state the reasons why I did support the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire and why I do oppose the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The Senator from New York goes upon the idea, as I understand him, that there was in this a vested right belonging to those persons who have instituted these proceedings, that these agents of the Government have a vested right in the final result of the actions that they have instituted before the courts of the country. The Senator from New Hampshire proposes to secure to the Government its revenue, but he holds that these agents of the Government whom he properly as I conceive characterized as quasi official agents of the Government, have no rights except the rights that they derive from Congress and hold at the will of Congress. As in regard to any other officers of the Government, Congress has the right and the power and it is the duty of Congress whenever they have discovered that the fees of any officers of this nation are more than adequate, or out of due proportion to the service rendered, to apply the corrective at once without regard to what the fees have been established heretofore or how they may now exist.

The country is aroused upon the facts presented that certain agents of the Government who have received their education in the slimy school of the detective have suddenly leaped from that school of education into the enjoyment of fortunes unequaled in their magnificence by anything except the fable of Aladdin. The other day poor, under a law passed by the last Congress they have received contracts from the officials of the Government that were given without a knowledge of what they were to work into or the importance that they were hereafter to assume. These contracts I say have been entered into and fabulous fortunes have been made by these detectives. The discovery is made by the country and the demand is that the law shall, so far as they are concerned, be repealed. If it is the demand of the country, and if it is that the law so far as these contracts are concerned shall be repealed, shall we here by legislation permit the law to work its way any longer in the interest of moiety-seekers and to the great detriment of the Government of the United States?

The honorable Senator from New Hampshire proposes to secure to the Government its revenues. He does not propose to disturb the actions that have been instituted, but he proposes that the Government shall derive the benefit to its revenue rather than that these interlopers shall secure these fabulous amounts to which the country declares they are not entitled. It is no injustice to them. They have no vested rights. Their rights are held at the will of the Government. It is a privilege rather than a right that they have, and that privilege they hold at the will of the Government. The Government comes now and says: "Your perquisites, your allowances are wrong, fabulous, out of all proportion to the service rendered; and now we propose to cut them off, and from this time henceforth give to the Government its revenue and not to informers."

I vote for the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, and against that of the Senator from New York, believing it right; and upon the other question I shall vote as my judgment shall incline, desiring to do no wrong to the merchant and certainly unwilling to do a wrong to the revenue department of the Government.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I certainly represent upon this floor no mercantile interests. I am not aware that in the State which I represent in part upon this floor there is a single individual who has been affected by this law of Congress under which Jayne and his associates have operated. It is not on behalf of the mercantile interests that I speak here. I can well conceive how an honest merchant would dislike without a moment's notice to have all his books taken and carted away from his counting-room and detained for months—breaking up his business. I can well understand the very natural antipathy such a man might have to such proceedings on the part of these detectives as the evidence taken before the committee of the House has disclosed. But it is not in their behalf that I object to this amendment of the Senator from New York or to the payment of these moieties. I object to the payment of these moieties in behalf of the hard-working people whom I represent, into whose Treasury these moieties should be paid, rather than to swell fabulous fortunes in the pockets of these detectives. It is in their behalf, and in their behalf alone, that I speak upon this floor, and I say that the law should not any longer continue under which these moieties should be paid to the custom-house officers of the United States. Their salary should be sufficient to pay them for the work they do, and for performing their duties in such a manner as to prevent these frauds on the revenue. They should perform their duties all over the country, as the senior Senator from Pennsylvania has just assured us that the officers at the port of Philadelphia have performed their duty, so as to prevent frauds upon the revenue, and in such a manner as to earn the commendation of the committee of the House which has investigated these matters. They are paid for that, and that duty they should do, and not leave it to individuals who can come in and take half of the penalties recovered and put into their pockets to make enormous fortunes for those who thus divert these penalties from the Treasury of the United States.

Why, Mr. President, in the port of Boston there is a naval officer in the custom-house who never did anything, so far as anybody is aware, to detect frauds or collect these penalties, who in the space of two years has received from the Treasury of the United States for performing no duty nearly the sum of $100,000.

Mr. CONKLING. Where is that?

Mr. WADLEIGH. At Boston. I make no charge against him. The sum was legally due him and he has legally received it. He had the right to do so; but it is a scandal upon the laws of the United States that a public officer who has done nothing to collect these penalties, or next to nothing—nothing, I think, in this case—should receive such enormous sums from the Government.

I am in favor of abolishing these moieties in reference to the custom-house officers, for whose benefit they have hitherto been paid. I am in favor of paying revenue officers of the United States a sufficient sum as salary to induce them to perform their duty, to induce them to prevent frauds upon the United States, and if they step back and say that they are not paid for that, fill their offices by men who will do it. Such men can be found, and it is our duty to so legislate as that frauds upon the Government of the United States will be prevented by the officials of the United States receiving regular salaries under its laws who will perform their duty with a view to performing their duty and not with a view to diverting to themselves such immense profits that we have seen flowing out of the Treasury of the United States within the past few years.

Mr. PRATT. I should like to ask my friend from New Hampshire one question before he sits down. Would it not result logically, if the position of my friend were true, that the Government of the United States ought to sue and recover back from the informers all the moneys that they have received under the laws that allowed them to receive moieties in consequence of the information that they furnished and the convictions which their services brought around? That is the difference between those who have received and pocketed the money already and those who have earned a title to the money now by furnishing the information and causing suits to be instituted which will result in the recovery of the penalty or forfeiture. Where is the difference?

Mr. WADLEIGH. The difference is simply this: that the sum has been adjudged to the informer and has been paid to him, the money becomes his, he acquires therein a vested right, and no law of ours can take that money from him; but where there has been no such adjudication, where actions have simply been commenced and a man has acquired no vested right, the Government has the right to repeal the law which it has found to be against public policy.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from New Hampshire. He says that there has been no judgment in favor of these informers, that he would not take the money from a party where it had been distributed. The law on the statute-book, as I understand, gives the money to the informer for the information. His right becomes vested when the information is given. The subsequent distribution does not affect his title, but the fact that he has given information entitles him to it. The suit is to verify the fact that he performed the services for which the law said he should have so much money. The only question is whether you will let him have money for services which you said by law you would pay for. It was not his fault that the law was a bad one. The law authorizes the services and authorizes the party performing it to receive a certain compensation. Now you say you will deprive him of the compensation by taking away the remedy. So you might deprive any man of a debt by taking away the remedy. What different ground does it stand upon than other debts?

Mr. WADLEIGH. In my judgement this law has been found to be against public policy; it has been found to be wrong. Then it should be repealed and these moieties should be diverted from the pockets of informers unless they have acquired such a legal vested right as will prevent Congress from doing its duty in that respect. I say it is clear that they have not, and that we can pass this bill and thereby change the compensation which these special agents, these detectives, these informers who have been in the service of the Government might have received if the law had not been changed.

Mr. STEWART. That is on the ground that the law is against public policy. Let us follow that a little further. Suppose that the Congress of the United States should authorize the construction of a canal over the Virginia mountains connecting the Mississippi Valley with the ocean, and should authorize contracts to be let and labor to be performed, and at the next session of Congress we should come to the conclusion that it was against public policy to have such a canal, but in the mean time hundreds of thousands of dollars had been invested in labor and in other ways under contract, would you repeal that law and deprive contractors of their pay because it was against public policy to run a canal over the mountains? Here is a case where you say Congress declares its policy to be to have a set of detectives, and it sets them to work and it agrees to pay them in a certain way for obtaining certain information. It is not the fault of the detectives that the law is against public policy; it is the fault of Congress. After the services have been performed, no matter what their character so that Congress authorized the performance of those services, it cannot say that the services shall not be paid for because the act of Congress was against public policy.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think, Mr. President, that the amendment of the Senator from New York is right, and if he had gone further and fixed it upon the precise day when this amendment was first published, I should have still thought it right and supported it although it might not have been so far off as the 1st of May. I believe the bill was reported here about the 20th of May; at any rate whenever it came to the knowledge of the people that there was a proposition of this kind published. I think it would have been right to propose the amendment which the Senator from New York now proposes. There is scarcely a law that we pass during the session where rights are involved that we do not protect those rights by some clause in the bill so as to prevent its operating as a hardship upon any previous state of fact. Here these parties have proceeded in the ordinary course of business under the ordinary provisions of law to discharge their duties, and any amount of compensation that they are legally entitled to, it seems to me, ought to be preserved to them.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, there has been a good deal said in this debate in relation to the detective service of the country. I have no word to utter in relation to it now, although I have very distinct opinions in relation to it. I do, however, believe that by the improper actions of some of the detectives this furor has been created pretty much all over the country. My object now in rising is simply to state practically what would be the effect of this bill if it were to pass as amended in committee.

I cannot, no man can, tell what number of informants are revenue officers and what are private citizens, and I hazard the opinion that of all information given in the country two-thirds is given by private individuals.

Mr. CHANDLER. Four-fifths.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from Michigan says four-fifths. I want to state it within certain positive limits. I say I can have no doubt there are two-thirds. Now what is the practical course in proceeding? An informant goes to the collector or to some subordinate officer of the collecting department, and he, together with that subordinate, goes to the collector and lodges an information. If that collector be an individual competent and proper to discharge the duties of his office, he does what? He demands of that informant such information as satisfies the collector reasonably, beyond a reasonable doubt, that there has been a fraud either perpetrated or one to be attempted, and before the collector will take the initiative step he compels that informant to furnish him with that evidence; and how does he do it? Let me tell you what I know. I know that in many cases that informant, no detective, in no way connected with the detective service, who has knowledge of a fraud either perpetrated or to be attempted upon the Government, gives the information; and I know that that informant in many cases is compelled before he completes that evidence for the collector's decision to visit foreign countries and to there verify the information with which he furnishes the collector. In other words, in almost every case where an outside man lodges an information with the collector he is compelled as the lawyers would say to make up his case, and he is obliged to contribute his time and spend his money. That is the way it is done. Two-thirds of your suits that are pending to-day are of this class. The amendment, if it be adopted, would deprive every single one of these informants of that share of the penalty, if there be a penalty incurred, which the law had promised him and upon which promise he was induced to incur the expense to which I have alluded. Is that just? Is that right?

Much is said about fabulous amounts. I know large sums have been paid to these detectives; but of the suits pending and the judgments to be rendered thereon who in this body shall say that the sums are at all formidable? They are made up almost exclusively of small sums, and are divided among individuals who have no connection with the collection of your revenues, either as officers or detectives. They are individual citizens, who under the inducements of the law have rendered a service by which the country is to be benefited.

But my friend from New Hampshire says that he votes for this because he wants to keep the money in the Treasury. I agree with him on that principle, and if you had not given these inducements to these outside men to make the investigation upon which a judgment is to be predicated and a fine to be imposed, no money would have ever come into the Treasury.

I insist, Mr. President, that it is unjust to this large class of people, the larger number, two-thirds, or, as the Senator from Michigan says, four-fifths—no matter what the precise number is—of whom are private citizens who have lodged their informations on which suits have been commenced; and if those suits are maintained by any action of ours it is unjust to say to them, "You shall not have what the law promised you although you have incurred expense in time and money in preparing that case which allows the Government to obtain a judgment against a dishonest man and to enrich its Treasury with the penalties that dishonest man is made to pay."

That is the view which I take in relation to this matter. The pending suits are not to realize the large sums that have arisen from cases that have been compromised. The great mass of these cases, you will find, are subjects relating to matters in account that are small; and outside men in no way connected with the Government are those who are interested. I cannot by my vote deprive them of what the law promised as an inducement for incurring the expenses which they have incurred.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, honest men engaged in a particular branch of business who honestly pay their duties are themselves the chief detectives on smugglers. I remember a case that appealed very strongly here a few years ago to the Department from Detroit and the detective was denounced in strong terms. I went to the custom-house officer in Detroit and said, "Where did you get this information?" He pointed me to the largest liquor dealer in the whole city of Detroit, and said he, "I got it there." There had been smuggling of liquor. Men in the dry-goods business who pay their duties honestly, whenever they find a neighbor who is underselling them, selling for what they know is not the cost, turn around and give this information, of course privately; they are not public informers; but I venture to say that more than four-fifths of all the information which leads to conviction comes from men who have no interest whatever with the Government or its detectives; they do it in the interest of their business. It is for the interest of every honest importer in these United States that every other importer shall honestly and fairly pay his dues to the Government. There is the source from which a very large amount of the information on which convictions occur is furnished.

I hold in my hand a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York headed "The moiety bill," which I received this morning, and it is signed by "A. A. Low, chairman," and "George Wilson, secretary." A. A. Low is a gentleman of the very highest character, and never would have written this series of charges which he has signed. He signed it pro forma as chairman of a meeting without examining into the language or the intent and meaning of the language contained in these resolutions. Permit me for a single moment to call your attention to one of these whereases:

Whereas the importers of this city are convinced that the necessities of commerce imperatively require that the pending moiety bill shall pass Congress and become a law to the end that the revenue service shall be reformed; that bribes shall not be offered to the employed to set moiety traps for the employer, nor treachery among clerks be exalted into an occasion for the bestowal of fortune and office at the hands of the Government; that the voice of the detective shall be hushed.

Now suppose the house of A. A. Low, for he is a wealthy man, should be entered to-night by burglars and all his plate stolen and all his valuables taken and carried off, what would A. A. Low do to-morrow morning early? Would he go to the burglars and ask them who stole his plate? He would do something. He must go somewhere. Where would he go? He would go to the chief of police and say to him, "Furnish me the best detective in your department; my house has been robbed, and I want to catch the robbers." And yet, Mr. President, the burglar who breaks into a house and steals his silver and his plate is a gentleman compared to the sneaking smuggler. The burglar goes boldly, knowing that if he is detected he forfeits his life or his liberty. The sneaking smuggler knows that if detected he will lose a little out of his pocket and he adds perjury. In smuggling, theft, robbery, and perjury are united; and yet all of our sympathies are excited not against the guilty scoundrel who has robbed your Treasury and done it deliberately and knowingly, but against the man who exposes the scoundrel who deliberately and knowingly robs your Treasury and has committed perjury.

Mr. President, I am a little tired of this kind of sympathy for the men who have defrauded the revenues and rendered the name of American citizens a stench in the nostrils of every honest man. I am ashamed to hear the parties who bring them to justice denounced, while dishonesty escapes uncensured and free. Sir, the boot is on the wrong leg. Out of fifty-nine men denounced on information furnished by private citizens to this man Jayne, as I am informed forty-eight have been convicted; and yet there is not a single word said about those forty-eight convicts who have defied the laws, defrauded the revenue, and merit condign punishment. But the detective, the man who brought them to justice, forsooth must be denounced here in their stead and upon this floor and elsewhere, because he has enforced the laws and brought these men to justice and money into your Treasury. There may have been wrongs connected with contracts under this law. If there has been, rectify that wrong; but do not stand up here and denounce those alone who enforce justice and let the wrong-doers go free.

Mr. ALCORN. The Senate will not permit itself to be drawn away from the question under discussion to the question of the system of detectives. The informant, the detective, the spy is necessary, and has been found to be necessary to almost every government that has existed, and I do not suppose that the Government of the United States intends now to lay down the doctrine that his valuable services are to be dispensed with. I do not think any such principle is involved in this bill. The very necessities and the very organization of our law and the characteristics of human nature are such as to demand at times the extraordinary measures that involve the employment of detectives in the interest of the Government.

So far as the detective is concerned, I have not risen here to make any assault upon him. I have made none upon him. Sanborn and Jayne did just what clouds of men would have done if they had had the opportunity. They made their money under a contract that they entered into, which contract was not appreciated by the officers of the Government at the time it was made. That, I believe, is understood to be the fact. The country has been startled by the fabulous amounts that have been derived by these men, coming as it did directly from the revenues of the Government of the United States. From the pockets of the hard-fisted yeomanry of the country into the pockets of these detectives hundreds of thousands of dollars have gone, and the country demands that the laws allowing it shall be repealed.

But now comes the Senator from New York with his amendment, and I propose to call attention to his amendment and to show its scope and bearing, and in a few words the reason why I am opposed to it.

Do we understand it to be the sense of the Senate that these moiety contracts, to wit, Sanborn's and Jayne's, are now to be, as far as is proper at least, repealed, cut off, and declared to be at an end by the Government? That I understand to be the case; but now the Senator from New York says that here there is principle involved, that there are vested rights. Does he not yield the principle when he proposes to confine the operation of this bill to the 1st of May? If there is a principle involved in this case, how can he abridge that principle, how can he make it operate from the 1st of May and cut off the man who furnished valuable information on the day after the 1st of May?

Mr. CONKLING. Would the Senator like an answer to that question?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I answer then by saying first that that was not my suggestion at all, but a suggestion originating virtually with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] and made in deference to him, and with him and with me resting upon this clearly-defined and well-understood principle of morals and of law. It was suggested that some of these persons concerned, in view of the proceedings here, in order to circumvent the proceedings here—such was the rumor or intimation—had made haste to enter suits in order, in short, to outwit Congress. The Senator from Massachusetts said there were such rumors touching things which had occurred in his State. Then the suggestion was made that if a day was fixed previous as we should say in court to lis mota, a day before the litigation began, that would be fair in substance, fair because nobody as we were advised would be visited with hardship except those who had justly incurred this hardship, if such there were, by attempting to outwit and circumvent Congress. In short, upon the familiar doctrine applied in many ways, that a man is not to take advantage of his own wrong, it was supposed that those who had made haste to forestall this legislation by entering suits on purpose to do it, if they were punished, could be punished without violating any principle applicable to men at large who were standing in good faith.

Mr. ALCORN. I alluded to the fact that the 1st of May had been accepted by the Senator from New York to show that, so far as the principle is concerned, it is a principle that in his judgment may be compromised.

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all.

Mr. ALCORN. If the 1st of May can be assumed, then the 20th of May or the 1st of December last can be just as well. But now I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New York to the force of his amendment in another respect, and I call his attention for the purpose of knowing what the effect of his amendment is to be upon this bill, and whether it is to be confined in truth and in fact to the 1st of May as laid down by him. Let me read and see whether I have his amendment correctly; I may not have it exactly correct:

Commenced prior to the 1st of May, 1874, or in anywise affect suits or actions commenced or forfeitures commenced prior to the 1st of May, 1874.

Now, I undertake to say that this clause providing for forfeitures incurred may go back ad infinitum, and forfeitures incurred long ago may be enforced under these contracts five or ten years hence, forfeitures incurred whether the suits have been commenced or not. Whether the forfeiture has been incurred does not depend under the amendment of the Senator from New York upon the action having been brought at all.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but if he will allow me one word——

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly; I do not wish to misrepresent the Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. I will save him the trouble of traversing part of this field of time and space regardless of this amendment, by reminding him that there is already in the bill a section which fixes three years as a statute of limitations for all purposes whatever, so that however inapplicable what he may be upon the point of saying to this particular amendment is, I remind him that for all purposes he need not illustrate by going back ten years as three years is the utmost limit.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator then object to these words going out of his amendment, "or forfeiture incurred?"

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator from Delaware whether he will vote for the amendment if those words are dropped?

Mr. BAYARD. I should vote for it much more cheerfully with them out than in.

Mr. CONKLING. But will my friend indulge me with an answer? Would he vote for the amendment if the words were dropped?

Mr. BAYARD. I would not.

Mr. CONKLING. So I supposed; and therefore I think it would be hardly worth while for me to accommodate the amendment to those who will vote against it in any event.

Mr. BAYARD. There is no reason, there is no logic in the Senator's answer to me.

Mr. CONKLING. It may be. I give it for what it is worth.

Mr. BAYARD. It not only may be, but it is so. The Senator here has proposed in his amendment not only that this law shall apply to suits commenced prior to the 1st of May, 1874, but he has added language which extends away beyond that date, so that a man could be pursued for forfeitures incurred long prior to May 1, 1874, whether suit were commenced or not. My remark was made in perfect good faith to him to know whether, as he said that the suits were subject to the statute of limitations contained in another section of this bill, he would object to confining his amendment to the class of cases which the first portion of the amendment provided for, and his answer to me is another question; not whether he will object or not, but whether I will vote for his amendment one way or the other.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to assure the Senator from Delaware that my answer to him was intended entirely in courtesy. If it shall become important at any time for me to explain any more fully than I have done the meaning of the amendment as I suppose it to be, that I will do; but for the Senator from Delaware to ask me whether I have any objection to dropping words to which he finds objection, when he is going to vote against the amendment in all its parts, I submit to him is a proposition which I am quite warranted in answering as I did with the utmost civility to him that if it will not influence his vote one way or the other, I of course want no compromise with him on the subject.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a word just here?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. This amendment was voted on last night, but I did not vote at all on account of an objection that I had to it, and I will say to the Senator from New York that if that objection is removed I will vote for it. If the word "for" is inserted in it in lieu of the word "or" I will vote for it, because that will make a very material difference. As it now stands, it does have, in my judgment, the effect that the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Delaware say it has. It does relate back to forfeitures incurred that are not now pending or were not pending at that time in suits; but the mere substitution of the word "or" to "for" will change it just as I understood yesterday was the intention. With that change it would make a material difference, as far as I am concerned, in my view.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend from Mississippi will pardon me for one moment, here comes the Senator from Illinois who proposes to vote for the amendment if the change is made, and therefore, although I do not understand that I extend to him any greater courtesy than I did to my honorable friend from Delaware, there is something to talk about, because he proposes to vote for it, and therefore I say to him with the utmost frankness, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to make the precise change he indicates, namely, using the word "for" in lieu of the word "or." In doing that, I predict that aside from my honorable friend from Illinois, other gentlemen who have been discussing this amendment will find just as much objection after I consent to this alteration as they have done before. The Senator from Illinois will not, but others will.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not give my reason for not voting yesterday evening on the amendment, but that was the reason. I did not vote for the amendment at the time because I did not like its language, but still I made no exception to it; but I now say with that change I shall vote for it; otherwise I shall vote against it.

Mr. ALCORN. Do I understand from the Senator from New York that he accepts that amendment?

Mr. CONKLING. I will if it is in order now, or whenever it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) If there be no objection, that change will be made.

Mr. ALCORN. Having directed attention, then, to this very important provision of the amendment that had not attracted the attention of the Senate, or which at least had not been brought in the scope of the discussion, the purpose I have with regard to it is now reached.

Mr. CONKLING. Knowing as I do that my friend is a logician, may I inquire whether he will now support the amendment?

Mr. ALCORN. O, no; I will not.

Mr. CONKLING. I hardly hoped the Senator would.

Mr. ALCORN. And I do not think my honorable friend will consider that I am very illogical in saying that I will not. I certainly am here to endeavor to put in the best possible form that amendment to which I stand opposed, and I certainly owe it as a duty to the country to endeavor to so far modify each and every amendment that may be offered to this bill as to make it as little objectionable as possible, and thereby I do not commit myself to its support. I am with the Senator from New Hampshire in favor of cutting off these moiety men abruptly, and I stand there.

Mr. MORTON. I am satisfied that this discussion will run on all the afternoon. I feel it to be my duty, therefore, to move to postpone the consideration of this bill and all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the currency bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of considering the conference report.

Mr. CONKLING. As it has fallen to my lot to criticise somewhat the details of the moiety bill, so called, and as it is not in my charge, nor have I the honor to be a member of the committee which reported it, perhaps I am not called upon to volunteer to interpose in its behalf. Nevertheless, the Senator from Indiana making the motion in the absence of the chairman of the Finance Committee, who I see at this moment has returned to the Chamber, I rose to say that with the Senate so thin as it is I thought it would be hardly right to lay aside this bill and take up any other. But the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Ohio, having entered the Chamber and being present, I accomplish my purpose or do my duty sufficiently by inviting his attention to the subject and hearing what he may say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have objected already to this bill being laid aside. We lose time in that way.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust, now that the debate on this matter has been gone through with, that we can finish this bill, and I therefore hope the Senator from Indiana will not press his motion. I do not like to vote against it, but I shall have to do so, because I think with the Senator from Vermont the true way to proceed with business is to complete what we have commenced. If we had had a quorum last night we could have finished this bill in five minutes and had it out of the way; but we were left without a quorum and had to adjourn.

Now the Senator from New York has offered an amemdment which has been discussed, and every Senator here has made up his mind how he will vote upon it. I hope, as the Senator from New York has modified his amendment, striking out the only word which seemed to be objectionable, so that the suit shall be for the forfeitures before the 1st of May, there will be no objection to it. While we are endeavoring to relieve the importers from oppression, alleged or otherwise, and making a fair law for the protection of the revenue, we ought not to do injustice to officers and men who under the law have earned money in our service. Therefore I hope this amendment of the Senator from New York will be adopted, and that we will go on and finish the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana insist on his motion?

Mr. MORTON. If I can be assured that this debate is about exhausted and we can have a vote very soon, I shall withdraw my motion; otherwise I feel it my duty to press it.

Mr. SHERMAN. We will close this matter out pretty soon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the motion of the Senator from Indiana to be withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, West, and Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Oglesby, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Washburn—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Brownlow, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Lewis, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Sprague, and Windom—16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as amended.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. STEWART. I move to strike out the twelfth section of the bill, and I ask that it may be read so that it can be understood. I call the attention of Senators to the reading of it.

The Chief Clerk read the section as follows:

SEC. [10] 12. That any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make, or attempt to make, an entry of imported merchandise by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or who shall be guilty of any willful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by such act or omission, shall severally forfeit and pay a fine of not more than $5,000 for each offense, to be recovered by an action in the name of the United States, in any district or circuit court of the United States; and in addition to such fine such merchandise shall be forfeited; which forfeiture shall only apply to the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged fraud relates; and anything contained in any act which provides for the confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. STEWART. The more I study this section the more I think its operation will be very injurious. For instance, it sweeps out of existence, as I understand, the following law:

If any person shall fraudulently or knowingly import or bring into the United States, or assist in so doing, any merchandise, contrary to law, or shall receive, conceal, buy, sell, or in any manner facilitate the transportation, concealment, or sale of such merchandise after importation, knowing the same to have been imported contrary to law, such merchandise shall be forfeited and the offender shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $50, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or both. Whenever, on trial for a violation of this section, the defendant is shown to have or to have had possession of such goods, such possession shall be deemed evidence sufficient to authorize conviction, unless the defendant shall explain the possession to the satisfaction of the jury.

It repeals pretty much all the general law defining these crimes, and I want to call attention to the particular language in which it is drawn. It seems to have been drawn by somebody who understood this thing remarkably well. With all due respect to the Committee on Finance, I think they have been deceived about it. I do not think they could have seen how far this section goes to break up all our laws on this subject, for remember this is to take the place of the other statutes as I understand. Now let us see if this section does not cover all cases of smuggling pretty much:

That any owner, importer, consignee, or agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make, or attempt to make, any entry of imported merchandise by means of any fraudulent or false invoice—

That is one step—

affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or who shall be guilty of any willful act or omission—

Every act of smuggling must consist of an act or omission—

by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by which act or mission, shall severally forfeit and pay a fine of not more than $5,000 for each offense, to be recovered by an action in the name of the United States in any district or circuit court of the United States; and in addition to such fine, such merchandise shall be forfeited.

This is the mode of punishment for all manner of smuggling, and if it does not abrogate all your other laws in relation to smuggling, it throws them all in doubt. Everybody knows how dangerous it is to interfere with criminal laws by substituting something else for them that will take their place. If this bill takes the place of your other criminal laws on this subject, as it will undoubtedly, then the only way in which you can punish a person who fraudulently imports goods is by suing him and recovering damages to the extent of $5,000 and forfeiting the particular article, taking that out of the invoice and leaving him all the balance. I do not believe we are prepared to make such a radical change in our customs laws.

Much has been said about the system of informers; but if that system is to be condemned, do not in your legislation destroy everything else. Because you complain of some of your special agents, is it therefore necessary to destroy your customs laws and destroy all the safeguards against fraud in the collection of the revenues? In order to get rid of one evil, are you going to destroy all the balance of the statutes on the subject of the collection of the revenue?

Here you propose a light penalty to be recovered only on action for damages, which can be put off from time to time and finally compromised. No matter what the amount of the fraud may be, the only amount to be recovered is $5,000. There is to be no odium attached, nothing criminal connected with it, but is to be a mere question of dollars and cents. If the smugglers get caught, they only lose the particular item in which they are detected. If they are importing merchandise and they stick their laces and other costly articles into a particular box, they take the chance of getting them all through and deceiving the revenue; but if they are caught they are to get out of the whole thing by paying a penalty of three, four, or five thousand dollars and the forfeiture of a single box. If they get caught, it amounts to nothing. Not only do you do that, but you propose to dispense with your informers and thus prevent their getting caught, and then your law says only one box in ten shall be examined. It is only necessary to examine one box in ten, as the law now stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. O, no; they can examine them all.

Mr. STEWART. But the fact is that they are so pressed with business that they never do exceed the requirements of the law. The language of the law is:

The collector shall designate on the invoice at least one package of every invoice, and one package at least of every ten packages of goods, wares, or merchandise, and a greater number, should he or either of the appraisers deem it necessary, imported into such port, to be opened, examined, and appraised, and shall order the package or packages so designated to the public stores for examination.

In the press of business upon them they never exceed the number required by law. Now you give the Government by law one chance in ten of detecting a man engaged in this business. You give him ten chances to one to get the article through, and when he happens to get caught you propose only a nominal punishment. You give him all these chances to evade the revenue. I say if he willfully and fraudulently comes in with a false affidavit and perjures himself willfully and fraudulently, no punishment can be too hard for him. When you give him all these chances, when he is aware of the fact that only one box in ten is to be examined, and he takes all the chances to swindle the Government and has nine chances to one to get through with that swindling, then when he is caught you are not going to punish him at all. Is that the intention of this act?

There are other provisions in this bill that are somewhat singular. You talk about mistakes; but it is expressly provided in another portion of the present statute, which I can turn to in a minute, that if there is a mistake in the invoice there is no forfeiture. A mistake in an invoice does not forfeit it. That is now expressly provided by law. It is only where there is a willfully fraudulent invoice that there is a forfeiture. The law now expressly saves mistakes. That is not cause of forfeiture.

Sir, you propose to say by this bill that importers, experienced men as they are, may with impunity and with design defraud the revenue, and you will only subject them to a slight punishment. If a needy beggar steals fifty dollars in the streets here to save his family from starvation, you put him in the penitentiary by your laws in this District. If a millionaire will deliberately swear to a falsehood with the design of defrauding the revenue, you propose to content yourselves with a simple action at law for damages, limiting them not to the amount that he has defrauded the Government, but to $5,000 and forfeiting the particular item in which you have caught him. Is that the way justice is to be administered? Is that the object for which this excitement is gotten up? Is this excitement really an honest indignation against the employment of detectives—a class I never did admire—and in answering that demand and dispensing with the moiety system, are we to go further and legalize smuggling because the parties are powerful? Can there be a greater crime among civilized men and against the laws of society than the deliberate, willful, wicked act, described in that twelfth section, of a merchant prince, having the confidence of the community and the power to make Congress almost tremble by his potent voice, attempting to defraud the revenue in this way. In the name of justice can there be a meaner crime than for him to make knowingly and willfully a fraudulent invoice, and then add perjury to his crime by swearing that it is true when he knows it to be false? Are we in response to this demand to declare that perjury and embezzlement and fraud are commercial honor? Are we called upon to do that? That is the effect of this twelfth section.

Under it the millionaire may say to himself, "I may designedly swear falsely, I may designedly rob the United States of millions, and then take the chances of having $5,000 recovered from me and losing the package in which I was found out." What a paltry punishment, and what a mockery of law! If that is the animus of this legislation, I shall vote against the whole bill. I say this man Jayne, though he may be ten times blacker than the power of description, ten times blacker than his most eloquent enemy has been able to paint him, is an angel of light compared with the millionaire who, for the purpose of defrauding his Government, that has made him rich by its liberal laws, and defrauding the people who patronize him, falsely brings in an invoice, and falsely and fraudulently and maliciously swears to a lie for the purpose of cheating the Government and the people, while he lives in a palace. I say Jayne, in whose behalf I have not a word to say, is an angel of light compared with the man who commits the crime described in this twelfth section. And yet for that man you have no punishment, but you hold out an inducement to him. You say to him in effect, "There is only one chance in ten of your being caught; go on with your fraudulent importations."

What chance has an honest importer against such a man? What chance has the man who does not intend to swear to a lie against the man who does, if there is no more penalty than this to be attached to it? The great body of importers are certainly honest men. If there is no punishment for designedly and knowingly presenting false invoices and maliciously swearing to the same, what chance has the man who has a conscience and a sense of honor to stay in the business? I know that the great bulk of the importing community have consciences. I know they are honorable men. But I know that those who are disposed to do evil can do so almost with impunity under this bill, and the honorable man will be compelled to retire from business. I have seen instances where honest men have been driven out of particular trades because they would not follow the crooked and insidious ways of other importers. I know many who have been driven out of the importing business on account of the devices that were gotten up by their dishonest rivals. If you remove all impediments against the actions of dishonest men in importing, what have you left?

Sir, I am opposed to this twelfth section for these reasons and for others which I shall very soon discover, I have no doubt, by looking further into the statutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I have a suggestion to make in relation to this section, but I do not know that it is practical on account of the rules of the body.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think this section would be very much improved by inserting after the word "to" in line 19, at the bottom of the page, the words, "the case or package containing." It would then read:

Which forfeiture shall only apply to the case or package containing the particular item of merchandise to which such frauds or alleged frauds relate.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Nevada has gone off into a very glowing argument on this subject, which I think is comfortable on this hot day; but it can be answered in a very few words.

The only difference between the existing law on the statute-book and the law contained in this section is that the existing law forfeits the whole invoice. For instance, suppose a merchant imports $100,000 worth of goods, and as in the case so often referred to, of Phelps, Dodge & Co., a single package, or a single pound of tin, or a single item in one box out of a thousand cases, is knowingly and willfully undervalued by any agent or person engaged in the whole business of importing, by the consignee abroad, the agent, or any one else, it forfeits the whole invoice. Therefore, to take the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co., the forfeitures alone amounted to over $1,700,000, while the variance only amounted to $1,600.

The purpose of this bill was to make the forfeiture, not to moderate the punishment. Why, sir, if a man commits perjury in swearing to one of these invoices in the custom-house, he is guilty of perjury and may be prosecuted for that crime and sent to the penitentiary. This section does not impair in the least any one of the criminal laws on the subject; but simply substitutes for the forfeiture of the whole invoice the forfeiture of the particular item. So the bill came to the Senate. Upon examining the bill the Committee on Finance made certain amendments which, without changing its meaning, made it plainer and more specific. But I think myself the suggestion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] is a valuable one. The purpose of the law is not to be guilty of oppression, not to punish grossly and exorbitantly an accident, or even a design; not to punish a small offense with a wholesale forfeiture amounting to millions, or to punish an honest merchant here because some clerk abroad has willfully, if you please, inserted in a single package out of a thousand packages a single article in violation of the customs law.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him——

Mr. SHERMAN. I prefer to get through.

Now, sir, I think it would be well, instead of forfeiting the particular item of merchandise, to forfeit the case, box, or package, or whatever it may be, using every form of the law, and all the contents of that package. This is a case that has sometimes occurred. Sometimes a shawl of great value is inserted in the middle of a package of some other kind of importations. There is a fraud. The merchant who receives that package may be entirely innocent. It may be done by collusion with some subordinates, some clerks, who in that way seek to evade the law; and yet if there is in the whole invoice a fraud by a subordinate—not by the merchant but by any one—to the amount of ten dollars, the Government may confiscate an invoice to the amount of $100,000. That is a gross injustice, and cases of that kind have actually occurred.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator is certainly mistaken.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. I say that under the law now a willful evasion of the law——

Mr. CONKLING. By a clerk abroad?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. O, no.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. The language is express: "any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person." Any person whatever who, whether with the knowledge or design of the owner of the goods or not, shall insert in one of these packages fraudulently a small article, may lead to the confiscation of the property.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be good enough——

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to finish the few remarks I have to make, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wished to ask a question; but if the Senator declines to yield, very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, is it the desire of the people of the United States to be guilty of oppression as against our own merchants and our own traders who conduct the business of the country? I think not. It seems to me therefore the design of this section is proper enough; but perhaps the House have gone to the other extreme. Instead of, as under the old law, confiscating the whole invoice, they have only confiscated the particular item of merchandise that participates in the fraud. They subject the owner, importer, consignee, or agent to a fine of $5,000 and they confiscate or forfeit the particular item. I do not see why the amendment of the Senator from Maine should not be adopted, why we ought not to extend the forfeiture to the whole package, case, or box, or whatever it may be, and all the contents thereof. With that amendment I think the golden mean will be attained, and then a person who violates your revenue laws is not only subject to all the penalties for smuggling, all the penalties imposed by your various revenue laws, but is by this section subject to a fine of $5,000 and the costs of the suit in a prosecution in the courts of the United States, and is condemned also to a forfeiture of the case, package, or box in which the fraud occurs. Surely that is severe enough against men who are engaged in the ordinary discharge of a legitimate trade. I have no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine, and I shall vote for it.

Mr. SARGENT. I desired to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio while he was speaking by a question to the fact that I either misunderstand this twelfth section or he does. Probably it is myself. He says, as I understand him, that the only difference here made is that we forfeit the particular item of merchandise in which the fraud is committed instead of the whole invoice. I say this section changes the law in that it makes a civil action in the name of the United States to recover the fine of $5,000 in one case, instead of an indictment where the penalty is a fine or imprisonment of two years. Does not the Senator admit that this makes a further change than that which he suggested? The original law says:

If any person shall fraudulently or knowingly import or bring into the United States, or assist in so doing, any merchandise contrary to law, or shall receive, conceal, buy, sell, or in any manner facilitate the transportation, concealment, or sale of such merchandise after importation, knowing the same to have been imported contrary to law, such merchandise shall be forfeited and the offender shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $50, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or both.

That is by prosecution and involves imprisonment. It is by a criminal proceeding implying disgrace. This section of the bill simply provides that it shall be an action in the name of the United States, and it eliminates any imprisonment, any disgrace, and leaves to the doubtful action by a civil suit the question whether the persons are to be punished at all.

Mr. CONKLING. And leaves to the solvency of the defendant whether any judgment is collected against him.

Mr. SARGENT. Undoubtedly. That is a most radical change in the law, and evidently a greater change than the chairman of the committee himself was aware of.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from California allow me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. If you have an indictment as the sole means of imposing this penalty of $5,000, that indictment can only be found where the offense was committed, and if you cannot get the party in that jurisdiction your remedy goes for nothing practically. If you give the United States an action, it may bring that action wherever the defendant can be found.

Mr. STEWART. Provided you can get service on the defendant.

Mr. SARGENT. Exactly. I do not care about discussing the relative value of these two provisions. The point I wished to make was that here was a radical change in the law. My own impression would be not merely in favor of the fine of $5,000, but of imprisonment, to guard against the insolvency of the defendant. At any rate, there is this change. Then a very important change is that which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] treats so lightly. He says there is only the difference of forfeiting a single item and forfeiting the whole invoice. There is that great penalty which hangs over the smuggler to deter him from running the risk of smuggling and defrauding the revenue of the United States and violating his own obligations to the Government and society and lowering the standard of commercial honor, because if smuggling can be successful no honest man can compete in trade; you demoralize all commercial transactions; you lower the whole standard of honor among your merchants; in fact you give bribes and rewards for dishonesty. Sir, it is not too heavy a penalty that an invoice which contains in its bosom fraud should be forfeited. The invoice was used with the intent to defraud. If in any one of the boxes out of the ten you examine there are put costly laces, or costly shawls, or opium, or some other article of small bulk and great value, there are ten chances to one that it will remain undetected and that the invoice will pass through. In the loose method of transacting this business, and it is necessarily loose on account of the great amount of business forced upon the custom-house, these frauds have all these chances of remaining undetected; but when they are detected, when the amount of vigilance which we are able to exercise succeeds in showing that an invoice is tainted with fraud, then it is not too great a penalty upon those who knowingly and willfully commit the fraud that the whole invoice shall be forfeited. I say that is not a light consideration, and this is not a light change in the law; but I wait for the Senator to explain these other differences in the law concerning which he certainly was in error at the time he made his remarks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was going to ask the Senator from Ohio if I had been successful in receiving the favor of his consideration at the time, as he was undertaking to tell us what the present law is about the forfeiture of the contents of an invoice, to be so kind as to show us what the present law is, in order that we might understand whether he was talking at random about the present law or whether he was speaking by the book, as the saying is. I did not know myself but that his statement was accurate; that a wrong committed by a person in a foreign country, without the knowledge or consent of the owner of the goods in this country who enters them at the custom-house, was followed by the forfeiture of the whole invoice. He said it was, if I correctly understood him. Now, the statute of the United States upon that subject, which I refer to with respectful diffidence, for it may not be authority, does not bear the Senator out in that observation, and the decisions of the courts of the United States upon the construction of that statute are unhappily equally adverse to the law opinion of the honorable Senator from Ohio. I read one, because I am anxious to get on with this bill and will not take the time of the Senate to go over the whole state of the law on this subject. One is this:

The offense under this section—

That of the undervaluation of invoices—consists in the making of an entry upon an invoice below the actual cost of the goods, with design to evade the duties.

That is to say, in the perfectly plain English language of the decisions of the courts, that the man who makes the entry, not Timothy Smith at Marseilles or John Jones at Yokohama, but the man who in the city of New York at the custom-house, or in the city of San Francisco at the custom-house, as the consignee or owner of the goods, makes a false and fraudulent entry of the value with the design to cheat the United States out of the duties that the law calls for, the man who deliberately goes to the custom-house and commits perjury to begin with and a fraud to end up with upon his fellow-importer and upon the people of the United States, shall run some risk of losing something more than the particular item, be it great or small, that he is called upon to swear about.

Now, Mr. President, I submit again, with diffidence, to the Senate and to the honorable Senator in charge of this bill, that the grandfathers of this Republic who in 1790 enacted that law understood the science of government pretty well. They understood the necessity in this age of the world, before the millennium, that the enforcement of law, the protection of innocence, the encouragement of trade, and the administration of justice require that perjury and fraud deliberately committed shall be visited by severity of punishment, and that it is not good government to hold out to the people the temptation to commit frauds and perjuries by holding up to them as the restraint upon the other hand the gentle punishment of saying, as in this instance, "All that you will lose will be exactly the sum that you have bet on the card," to use a phrase that will be understood by my western friends; "there is no other consequence to follow you; all that you lose is exactly what you put up on that particular fraud that you intend to commit. If you can bury your nutmegs or your diamonds in a hogshead of salt or sugar; if you can fold up your laces from Brussels in a chest of tea, and if in looking through a thousand chests of tea in a cargo they happen to hit that particular one"—they only take one in ten, as everybody knows who knows anything about a custom-house, to look into for actual inspection—"if they happen to hit in that one in ten the one that contains the lace shawl or the laces, worth it may be $100,000," (and it would only take a package as big as your hand almost,) "all that the fraudulent consignee"—not the fraudulent man in Brussels, his agent, who put it in for him, but the fraudulent owner or consignee who knowing that that lace was in the chest of tea goes to the custom-house and swears that that is a true invoice and that the package contains nothing else but what is truly exhibited in the invoice, for that is what he has to swear to; if he is found out, all he loses is the particular item in which the fraud occurred. If the one chance in the thousand occurs, and that is all the risk he runs, because they only take one in ten in sampling large invoices to inspect them; they do not take out every chest; so that he runs about one chance in a thousand, if that man is found out, then the Senator from Ohio tells the honest people of the United States that all that justice requires, all that good policy requires, all that fair dealing and honest government require, is either that that particular package of lace or that particular package of tea shall be forfeited, and that the man who has added perjury to fraud, the owner of the rest of the goods contained in that invoice, may take the rest of the things out of the custom-house at his free-will, perhaps containing also in some one of the other chests that have not been examined more shawls and more laces.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator say that the tea would be fo-r feited as well as the shawl?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I say that the Senator from Ohio claims that it would not, and it should not be.

Mr. CONKLING. Clearly under this bill it would not be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am stating what the present law is. I say the men of 1790 who framed the law for the purpose of the protection of the revenue, for the protection of tax-payers, for the encouragement of trade, for the promotion of honesty among dealers, understood something of the philosophy of government when they declared that a fraud committed upon the Treasury in this way—not as the Senator from Ohio supposed the law to be, by some man in a foreign country of whose conduct the owner had no knowledge—but if the owner of the goods making the entry knowingly swears to this false invoice and thereby undervalues the contents of his packages, then the contents of the invoice, the whole thing that he undertakes to swear to in a lump, shall go together. I repeat, Mr. President, with all deference to the Senator from Ohio, that the law is not as he has stated it to be. I will read again, that there may be no misunderstanding as to what the present law is in the settled judgment of the courts:

The offense, under this section, consists in making an entry upon an invoice, below the actual cost of the goods, with design to evade the duties. No matter how fraudulent the invoice may be, still if the entry is made according to the actual cost the party making it is guilty of no offense.

If the owner's agent, therefore, sends him a false invoice, the owner still has the locus penitentiæ; he may still repent till the last moment and go to the custom-house and make his honest entry of the actual cost, and his goods are not forfeited because the invoice was fraudulently made up by his agent abroad. No, Mr. President, punishment now is only visited upon the guilty citizen of the United States, who intending to commit perjury and intending to commit fraud, boldly goes to the public officers of the country and endeavors to cheat through, by lying and stealing combined, an entry of goods that he is about to make.

Some honorable Senators say that their cheeks tingle with shame because we are endeavoring to protect some honest dealers and the Treasury against that class of people. Sir, my cheeks have not begun to tingle yet in that direction. My sympathies are not greatly excited in that direction.

I believe it has been stated, certainly I think it is the fact, that in the report of the House of Representatives, which has been referred to, it appears that this person, Mr. Jayne, who is now the scape-goat for all the sins that we or our ancestors have committed, out of fifty suits and prosecutions that he has commenced so infamously, as it has been said, under this hard and grinding and oppressive law going to the destruction of innocent persons, juries of their fellow-citizens, and courts of their fellow-citizens have in forty-eight of the fifty cases found that the owner who went to the custom-house and made the entry designed to defraud the United States and accordingly resorted to the contrivance of perjury and falsehood in his invoice to accomplish it, was guilty. Now I beg Senators to tell me if people who commit that class of crimes are entitled to have the law made any more lenient for their sakes? Every Senator would say no, I have no doubt.

Then for whose sake is it that we are to make this change? Is it for the sake of the other two in the case I have supposed, as it is stated in the House report, who were acquitted? If the Senator from Ohio will turn to the criminal records of his own county in Ohio and take fifty indictments that have been presented, the very last fifty, if you please, or the first fifty anywhere in the territory of that State of well-ordered jurisprudence—because I am bound to say that I believe the jurisprudence of Ohio has been as learned and as fair as that of any country of which I have any knowledge—he will find that more than two of those indictments have been found against innocent persons, if you take the verdict of the jury as evidence of innocence. What should be the consequence logically, then, upon the philosophy of legislative jurisprudence upon which the Senator stands? The consequence should be that he should appeal to the Legislature and the people of Ohio to wipe out the system of grand juries and the finding of indictments in Ohio, because out of fifty indictments more than two of them had turned out to be the prosecution of innocent persons, broached by the malice of some witness who had a scandal to bear or a revenge to gratify, broached it may be by the malice of some man in the grand jury who had a revenge to gratify.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to know if in a case of that kind it should be proposed—I am sure the Senator from Ohio would not defend it—to abolish all grand juries and courts because in the state of human affairs it is necessary to the punishment of the guilty that sometimes the innocent should be brought into inquiry——

Mr. CAMERON. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business for the reason that there are a very large number of cases to be acted upon, and to enable the clerks to get through with their ordinary business by the time of adjournment fixed, it is necessary that we should decide those cases now. I move, therefore, with the hope that there will be no objection to it, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting that question, the Chair——

Mr. SHERMAN. On that question I call for the yeas and nays, and I object to any business until this matter is determined.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If debate is going on, I have not finished my speech.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator gave way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I beg the Senator to understand that I gave way for some motion the Senator from Pennsylvania wanted to make, not knowing what it was to be, and inasmuch as the subject under debate is this bill, if we are to have any debate I wish to finish my remarks so as to get on, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this motion the Senator from Ohio demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg the Chair to understand that I did not object to his clearing his table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senate is not going into executive session, I want to finish now the little that I have to say, because I am not well. If we are going into executive session, very well; I want to know it at once.

Mr. CAMERON. It is necessary we should go into executive session.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Jones, McCreery, Pease, Ramsey, Sargent, Spencer, Stewart, Tipton, and West—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Buckingham, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Pratt, Ransom, Robertson, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Wadleigh, Washburn, and Wright—34.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Brownlow, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Hitchcock, Howe, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Patterson, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Windom—19.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I was endeavoring to show when this episode occurred that by the principles of the act of 1799, which was established by the fathers of the Republic, the idea was entertained and clearly set forth that a fraud committed by the owner of the property in making a knowing and designed undervaluation and false entry was one which ought upon just principles, and so they put it in the law, to be followed by a forfeiture of the value of the goods contained in the invoice through and by which and under which he undertook to commit the fraud.

Mr. SHERMAN. I referred to the law of 1830.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am coming to the law of 1830, but I have not got the book.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have just found it myself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator stands on the law of 1830. Will he be kind enough to lend me the book?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now the Senator says that he referred to the law of 1830. The subject upon which he was speaking was this principle of how far the forfeiture ought to extend when a fraud was attempted to be committed upon the Government. If the Senator means that he does not think that an innocent owner ought to be made responsible for a wrong or a false swearing or a false package or a false invoice that has been made out by his foreign correspondent without his knowledge or connivance, and which on its being sent to him, he believing it to be true, swears to before the custom-house and thereby gets his goods passed, I agree with him, and I undertake to say that the law now does not visit upon an innocent owner who thus swears in good faith to a false invoice as true believing it to be true, and that he is stating the actual cost and the actual correspondence of the invoice with the contents of the package, the punishment of the forfeiture of the whole invoice.

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon that point I beg leave to differ with the Senator, and that is the point to which I called attention, that under the law of 1830, if there is any defect, if the invoice does not correspond in every item, the smallest item, if one single article is introduced that is not found in the invoice but is found in the package, the owner forfeits the package or the invoice. That is what I understood to be the law, but I could not turn to it at the moment. Another Senator has called my attention to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We were talking about entries made in the custom-house. We have now come to the question whether the cargo agrees with the manifest; we will treat of that. That is not the case we began to discuss. If we find that we have been upon a switch-line all this time and I have been chasing my friend from Ohio "over the hills and far away" about a subject that he did not mean to introduce into this debate, then I beg his pardon and that of the Senate, saying perhaps that this is meat reasonable for digestion; nevertheless if we find that the founders of this Republic, people who understood the science of Government and of punishment, laid it down in their laws that an intentional attempt made by the owner of goods to defraud the revenue through an invoice and an entry combined, an entry upon an invoice, should be followed by a forfeiture of the whole invoice, then perhaps we have in a fair discussion of this subject—and I certainly wish to have no other—made one step in the direction of ascertaining what the real and true philosophy and practice of the law should be.

Then I understand that we both agree, as my friend seems to have confessed and avoided, as the saying is among lawyers in pleading; I understand that we are at one now upon the proposition that in such case the law ought to be so, because he does not question the correctness of that conclusion, he does not question the correctness of the decision of the judges which I have read; he does not question the illustration that I have put to him, although of course I put it at random, of the state of indictments in the best counties of Ohio or Vermont.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, I admit that under the law as it now stands, no person in this country can be punished for an offense under the criminal statutes, or even for a penal offense personally, for any violation of the law in the process of an importation unless he was personally guilty of wrong intent; but nevertheless, if there is a difference between the manifest and the actual goods, the property is confiscated to the Government, the invoice is confiscated in some cases, the package is confiscated although the owner of the property may be perfectly innocent of a wrong intent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see the point of my honorable friend, and I hope he will perceive that I am not quite so hard on him in refusing to allow him to interrupt me as he was in refusing to allow me to ask him a question, but as my discourse is not of much consequence and his was, perhaps there is good ground for the distinction.

Now the Senator says that after all he does not really think that the law does warrant the punishment of a person personally by a penalty imposed on his body, as a fine or an imprisonment, unless he makes the entry knowing it to be false with the design to defraud. That is not merely the law. What I have been talking about and what I understood him to be talking about was a forfeiture of goods, not a personal penalty to be enforced by a proceeding in rem against the property. Do not let us wander from the point any more. It is upon that point that the statute of 1799 that I have read speaks; that is:

If any goods, wares, or merchandise of which entry shall have been made in the office of a collector, shall not be invoiced according to the actual cost thereof, at the place of exportation, with design to evade the duties thereupon, or any part thereof, all such goods, wares, or merchandise, or the value thereof, to be recovered of the person making entry, shall be forfeited.

Then it proceeds to point out how they shall be forfeited, by the process with which undoubtedly the Senator from Ohio is so perfectly familiar, of a seizure by the collector, of a report to the marshal, of a report to the district attorney, of the filing of an information or a libel, as the case may be, of a seizure by the marshal, and a proceeding against the goods; and upon that it is I say that the construction of this statute has been settled definitely, that in order to this forfeiture of the goods, not in respect to any penalty, of which we are not now speaking at all, there must exist in the consignee or the owner who makes the entry upon the false invoice the knowledge that that invoice is false, while he knowing that puts it forward as true, in order that he may cheat his fellow-importers and the Treasury at one blow. That, with great deference for the superior knowledge of the Senator from Ohio in respect to legal procedure, I submit upon this statute and this decision as the law upon that topic; and if I am wrong, I should be very glad, speaking of this precise point, to have some champion of this bill stand up and tell me how and why I am wrong. I do not wish to be understood as boasting of any knowledge of the law in saying this. What I have stated is as familiar to every student in a law-office that has any practice under the revenue laws of the United States as the simplest statute of Ohio on the subject of dividing-fence lines in particular places is to the common attorneys of that State or as a similar statute is to the attorneys of Vermont. It does not require either erudition or industry to find out as much as this about the laws of the United States on this topic, and I cannot doubt that the Senator from Ohio, who has been pressed by haste I suppose, is perfectly familiar with it, only he has forgotten to state it.

Now we come to the confession and avoidance, and we are to find out about what the law is not in respect to a falsely-sworn invoice or an undervalued package, where the design of the owner as I have stated, but where the contents of the package do not conform to the manifest of the vessel and so on. That, the Senator says, is to be found in one place under the act of 1830, and in that respect the Senator is correct. There are some later acts upon the same subject which I have not the inclination, in this state of the temperature, to weary the Senate by referring to, and I will put it out now as an anchor to windward for the future. When we come to repeal this thing in three or four years, he will find that they essentially modify the particular views that he has respecting the fourth section of the act of the 28th of May, 1830. That fourth section, which I see he has underscored in this book and I therefore imagine I am on the right track this time, reads as follows:

That the collectors of the customs shall cause at least one package out of every invoice, and one package at least out of every twenty packages of each invoice, and a greater number, should he deem it necessary, of goods imported into the respective districts, which package or packages he shall have first designated on the invoice to be opened and examined, and if the same be found not to correspond with the invoice—

Which clause I will suggest to the Senator was repealed by the act of 14th of July, 1832—or to be falsely charged in such invoice, the collector shall order forthwith all the goods contained in the same entry to be inspected; and if such goods be subject to ad valorem duty, the same shall be appraised; and if any package shall be found to contain any article not described in the invoice, or if such package or invoice be made up with intent, by a false valuation, or extension, or otherwise, to evade or defraud the revenue, the same shall be forfeited.

Now, let me ask every fair-minded Senator who really means to understand the English tongue—and that includes every Senator here—to look at this with his own eyes, if he has any doubt about it, to see what it means. The Senator from Ohio is again as much mistaken as he can possibly be, if I understand him to mean that if there is found in a package an article not contained in the invoice the package is forfeited. It does not say any such thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. You will see a note of the decision of the court.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see the note and I see the decision. I beg the Senator to understand that this is not the very first time I ever saw these statutes or the notes, although I do not happen to have had the pleasure to inspect this particular bill; but living so near the border as I do it is possible for the Senator to imagine that I have seen these acts before. The act I last read says in terms that if there be found to be a non-conformity of the contents with the invoice or manifest, then there shall be an inspection of the whole stock, and if there be found in that stock an article that is not named in the invoice and so not entered at all, that article is forfeited. Second, if it be found that that package has been made up, or the invoice has been made up with the intent by a false valuation or extension, which the Senator of course understands means to put in something additional that is not named in the invoice—that is what "extension" means—"to evade or defraud the revenue, the same shall be forfeited." In that case it speaks of the package. If the package is made up by extending it, or by falsely stating the value in the invoice, then the package is forfeited. But if the Senator will be kind enough——

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a note there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So I understand, and I will come to it in a moment. I have not the facility of the Senator, as he well knows, and I cannot do two things at once.

"If such package or invoice be made up with intent by a false valuation," &c., "to evade or defraud the revenue, the same shall be forfeited." If the package is made up, which the owner himself ordinarily does not make up, but the foreign correspondent does, with intent to defraud, then the package is forfeited. If the invoice is made up on which the consignee, as before, relies for his entry, and which he must already have presented at the custom-house before the officer makes this selection for inspection, is found to be false with the intent as before, in the other section of the act of 1799 that I have read, there does follow a forfeiture. Now as the Senator wishes me to come to the note, I will come to it:

And if any package shall be found to contain any article not described in the invoice, the same shall be forfeited.

I leave out some of the intervening words to make it as short as I can. The note to that clause is:

On an information for forfeiture of a package of goods containing an article not described in the invoice, evidence of accident or mistake may be given to rebut the inference of fraudulent intention, but it is not a sufficient ground of defense.

The application of that depends upon the state of the circumstances to which it is applied. Does it not? Of course it does. It is not a defense to the forfeiture of the particular article which has thus been found to be extended or undervalued, not contained in the invoice at all, I should say, for this does not relate to undervaluation at all and for what reason? For the reason that that article has by the very fact of its having been brought into the port become forfeited by operation of law for the reason that no entry was made of it at all. The Senator understands that perfectly well. If this article is brought, whether concealed or openly, into the country without being entered at the custom-house, the law necessarily declares—and the Senator does not mean to change that, I take it—that the article is forfeited to the United States because it is not put in a condition to pay any duty at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand the invoice or package is forfeited.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not as it respects this clause what I have read. If the Senator will again look at the language he will see that he and I ought not to misunderstand each other about so simple a proposition of law. The note to which the Senator refers is note d. If he will look at the text he will find as the subject to which note d refers this clause:

And if any package shall be found to contain any article not described in the invoice the same shall be forfeited.

What does it mean? Does it mean the package shall be forfeited? Not at all. It means that article shall be forfeited, and the court hold that you may introduce evidence to rebut the intention of fraud, because if there were fraud, under the next clause the package would be forfeited, but if you can rebut the intention of fraud the whole package is not forfeited, and every custom-house officer, I am sure——

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to interrupt my friend again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure. I know the Senator can occupy the time better than I can.

Mr. SHERMAN. O, no. I simply refer to the Senator from Maine or the Senator from Massachusetts to ask whether or not in such cases by the practice of the Department, which is the best construction of the law, such an omission of an article from the invoice does not forfeit the invoice.

Mr. CONKLING. Without fraud?

Mr. SHERMAN. The bare fact. The law is here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope these Senators will not answer just now, because if I am to be tried by a jury I want a chance for a few peremptory challenges. [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, this is certainly amusing. Here the Senator from Ohio undertakes to put down the construction of the statute which he begins to see with his own plain eyes is directly opposite to what he thought it was, by telling me that the practice of the Department is the best construction of the law. The practice of the Department, Mr. President, recently I have understood was to give out contracts to Sanborns, and that sort of people to go skilloping over the country to gather up odds and ends; and I believe we all agree (although I do not know that we have acted upon it, and I cannot refer to the opinion at the other end of the Capitol) that the practices of the Department are not altogther the best guides to what the law is. If I am wrong in that the Senator can correct me.

Mr. CONKLING. But the Department never held any such thing as this, I undertake to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from New York says the Department never held any such thing as this. If there is any one thing according to the statements of our adversaries that the Department has not held it must be that one thing, for they are said to have held everything else. But that is joking; I do not mean it. The Department generally holds right; and seriously I think I am safe in saying—for I myself have had a considerable amount of experience at the profession on both sides of such cases—that in the district in which I live at home where almost a million dollars of duties is collected, and where the docket of the district court which proceeds in these causes is loaded with disputes on every clause of this statute all the time, it never occurred to the distinguished people, from Governor Van Ness down, who have held the office of collector of the district of Vermont, and the distinguished judges, from Prentiss—some of whose descendants now adorn the bar of the State represented by the Senator from Ohio—down, that you were going to forfeit a package or an invoice from the fact that you found in it an article which was not named in the manifest or in the invoice unless it was accompanied as this statute says in express terms by the fraudulent intent on the part of the party that presents the manifest or his invoice and makes his entry, thereby to defraud the revenue. That is all the statute goes on to say.

I will proceed, Mr. President, in order to demonstrate, if I may, how clear it is as it will be to the eyes of any Senator who will sit down with the book before him and read it that what I am saying is the law:

And if any package shall be found to contain any article not described in the invoice, it shall be forfeited.

That is the article, and you cannot, as the decision which the Senator asked me to read says, forfeit the whole unless you prove the fraud, and the whole, if forfeited, is forfeited under the very next clause:

Or if such package or invoice be made up with intent, by a false valuation or extension or otherwise, to evade or defraud the revenue, the same shall be forfeited.

What is the use of this last clause if the Senator is right about the first? It has nothing at all to operate upon. The first clause operates on the thing you find that is not in the manifest or in the invoice. The second clause operates on the whole package or the invoice. If the package is made up with intent to defraud and is undertaken to be got through the custom-house with that intent, that is forfeited. If the invoice is made up with intent to defraud and the revenue is attempted to be evaded by the putting through of that invoice as true when it is false, then the contents of the invoice are forfeited just as by the act of 1799. The men who passed the act of 1799 did not intend as they did not in fact change the law a hair as it respects the cardinal feature of which we are speaking. I think so, and I believe on reflection that the honorable Senator will think so too.

But, Mr. President, I have taken more of the time of the Senate about this matter than I ought to have done. There are some other topics that I think ought to be considered; undoubtedly they have been considered by the committee, as to what becomes of the various penal clauses against actual fraudulent operators in this country and at the custom-houses in the various ways that they attempt to perpetrate these frauds where personal penalties to be enforced by indictment or information are imposed upon them, and also have been as by the other criminal laws of the country personal penalties are imposed upon those who willfully and with fraudulent or malicious intent undertake to break the laws of their country—how these various provisions are left, as I see they are not contained in the bill. This bill is apparently a substitute for the provisions about frauds on the revenue which the act of 1799, and of 1830, and of 1832, and of 1866, contained. I do not know how these are left.

Mr. CONKLING. They are repealed expressly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from New York says they are repealed. If that be so, I submit again with all deference to the committee and the Senate if we are not going a great way. Are we to sweep out of the statutes of the United States every personal penalty which is contained in these carefully drawn statutes under which for seventy-four years we have been practicing and in respect to which this clamor has not been raised at all? This clamor is against spies and informers as they are called, the moiety men; but on the tide of that fair wind which floats these Cæsars to their fortunes there is to be carried also a convenient repeal of all the criminal laws of the country against men who are to be convicted by a jury of their fellow-citizens and who cannot be compelled to give evidence against themselves of a manifest intent with malice aforethought to cheat the Treasury and to wrong their fellow-citizens. These are all to be repealed, and all this because we have got the momentum which enables us to do it and repent afterward. If this be so, however much I might be in favor of the reforms which the committee think they are making in some parts of the bill, I could not go for any such sweeping repeal as that.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the question I think is on striking out the twelfth section?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question.

Mr. CONKLING. I shall vote for that motion, but before doing so perhaps as well as ever during the residue of this discussion, I may state the opinion I have of many of the provisions of this bill.

I am ready to vote, I mean to vote to dispense altogether with the moiety system so called. I did vote yesterday owing, as I did not explain at the time, to particular provisions of the pending bill, to repeal all legislative provisions authorizing the seizure or inspection of books and papers. Doubting somewhat the vote I gave in the latter respect, I still stand ready and committed by my own judgment to vote for an abolition of moieties and a repeal of the provisions for the seizure and inspection of books and papers. I may perhaps be compelled to vote for these two provisions by saying "yea" when my name shall be called upon the passage of a bill, in my judgment one of the most improvident, one of the most extraordinary, one of the most perverse or else the most ignorant, ever gravely presented in good faith by intelligent men as a piece of legislation.

It is not in order to refer to what has occurred in the other House. I do not mean to refer to it. The Senator from Ohio has told us that this subject received great attention from a committee of the House. Were I at liberty to refer to the public prints in that regard, I might show much of the attention of that committee was given to matters having nothing to do with the generalities or the details of this scheme and how little of the attention of the committee or the House ever descended upon this bill in respect to many of its most cardinal features having nothing whatever to do with the abuses of moieties and nothing to do with the seizure of books or papers. But it comes to us wafted by the honorable Senator from Ohio upon a eulogium pronounced on the services of the House in perfecting it, and we are asked to take it upon such commendation. The proceedings were ushered in by the Senator from Ohio proposing, as the brackets in the printed bill indicate, to strike out half a dozen lines, commencing with the third, of the bill on the ground of an error there committed by the House, on the ground that the House had gravely proceeded to repeal certain provisions which had been repealed long ago and were utterly dead, calling upon neither House for legislative action. We turn over a page and we find an amendment indicated by italics in these words: "Under the customs-revenue laws." Why? Because, explained the Senator from Ohio, the House had proceeded to strike down at one fell swoop all moieties and penalties not only under the customs laws, but, said the Senator from Ohio, under the steamboat laws upon which the security of property and life still depended. So we went from step to step in this bill, and the proceedings are strewn with the evidence upon the report of the Finance Committee that loose indeed has been the process of which came this bill if it ever originated with men knowing anything about the subject and honestly intent upon it.

I think, then, Mr. President, offsetting the action of the Finance Committee against the eulogized action of the House, it will be pardonable for the humblest member of the Senate to trust himself by virtue of his own judgment and intelligence to this great and radical measure. I want to put upon the record one prediction, not that I may gratify a childish fancy hereafter if the event shall prove with me, by saying "I told you so," but to the end that the vote I may give should I be compelled to give it in the end for this bill as an entirety, may be qualified in the present and the future by something evincing the knowledge that I think I have of many of its provisions. I record the prediction that if this bill shall be enacted into law, even in its now improved shape, for I think the Senate has improved it greatly, it will come back to plague its inventors, and in this prediction I do not refer to the repeal of moieties. I do not refer to the repeal of the provision under which books may be seized or papers inspected; but I refer to provisions having nothing whatever to do with these or any other alleged sources of abuse, but as far as the east is from the west from the topics, the complaints, the difficulties to which public attention has been so vividly directed. I have no doubt it will impair, greatly impair the revenues of the Government. I cannot doubt that it will introduce disorder and to an extent which perhaps would sound like a caricature were I to utter it in the presence of Senators whose wide knowledge of this subject very likely lies behind the smile with which they receive some of the suggestions we have heard.

I am going to speak more especially in regard to this twelfth section, and before doing so I must not forget to remark that no graver offense sustained by evidence has ever in my judgment been laid at the door of the Treasury Department than is contained in the statement of the Senator from Ohio that there came from that Department to him, with the formal assent at least of the head of the Department, suggestions which do not conflict with provisions here to be found, as he presented them to the Senate.

The twelfth section proposes to revolutionize the law touching penalty and punishment for smuggling. The Senator from Ohio excused it or justified it in one point in his remarks in such wise that had he been warranted in his statement of the law as it now exists or as it will become should this bill be enacted, I should listen to his reasons with partial if not with entire satisfaction. But as I understand it, the Senator is entirely wide of the mark when he says that the meaning of the twelfth section of this bill is to lay hold of cases where a clerk, an agent, or anybody else in his phrase on the other side shall willfully make a false invoice or entry. Speaking to you, Mr. President, I need not refer to the provisions of this act in order to show that the Senator from Ohio is mistaken in that regard. I need not remind you that an act of Congress attempting such a province, covering such a scope, would be as void as the paper upon which it is written. I need not remind you that the jurisdiction of the United States, the limits of her constitutional power, regardless of the bill, stops short of the limit to which the Senator from Ohio thinks it goes. But the bill itself in its letter and unmistakable intendment confines to what shall be done in our own custom-houses the subjects upon which the bill is to operate. Now let me see:

That any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make or attempt to make any entry of imported merchandise—

Does that mean on the other side of the water? Does that mean an entry to be made wilfully or otherwise in England or France? No—

An entry of imported merchandise—

Merchandise which has been brought here, how?

by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or who shall be guilty of any willful act or omission, by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties—

Shall pay a fine and so on.

I ask the Senator from Ohio does he mean to tell us that that section acts or can act upon some man abroad, whether he be a clerk or not, who commits the crime there described.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think I said that; I am sure I did not.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend did say it, and when I said to him that certainly he was mistaken——

Mr. SHERMAN. What I said was this: that under the customs laws as they now were, any neglect or criminal conduct or willful error made by a clerk in a foreign port would lead to the confiscation of either the invoice or package here. That is all I said about it. I never said and certainly could not have said that a man could be punished here criminally under a penal statute personally for an offense committed abroad without his knowledge.

Mr. CONKLING. Does my friend say that under this act the goods would be forfeited in that case?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not under this act.

Mr. CONKLING. Does he say they would be under existing acts?

Mr. SHERMAN. I say under the existing acts any willful mistake, neglect, or fraud committed by any person whatever, abroad or here, in the importation of a package or invoice of goods, according to the nature of the package or invoice, does forfeit the goods; but the Treasury Department in all cases have required proof of a fraudulent intent, not of the particular owner of the goods but all persons concerned in the importation. That is the way I understand it. That is the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co., where it was admitted that Mr. Phelps was not particeps criminis in what were alleged to be omissions and neglects.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me a moment it is amazing that he and I should differ upon a point like this. Neither of us can be mistaken about it without being guilty of ignorance which we never could defend. Now I undertake to say to my honorable friend from Ohio that after a somewhat active professional experience of more than twenty years, having often had occasion to look at these statutes and to look at the decisions upon them, having heard much discussion in regard to them, I never have until to-day heard it insisted that the goods of an importer were forfeited owing to the fraud of somebody on the other side, which he knew nothing about. Here sits the late Secretary of the Treasury [Mr. BOUTWELL] within the sound of my voice. I should like him to answer if he ever heard of such a case. I should like the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] to answer if he ever heard of such a case. Look at the statute and you find it provides that whoever shall enter goods where he has knowledge that they have been falsely invoiced on the other side shall be found guilty so and so; and yet the Senator from Ohio refers to the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co., to bear out his idea.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be drawn unnecessarily into a discussion of that case although I would not decline the discussion whenever it should be necessary to elucidate the point. Let me, however, remind the Senator from Ohio that the allegation was in that case that every time an invoice was sent here which invoice was used at the custom-house and upon which duties were paid, another invoice in a letter called a secret invoice was sent and received by the same arrival; and what was the offense that this unfaithful clerk who has been visited with so many anathemas committed against his late employers? It was that snatching a parcel of leaves from an invoice-book, tearing out these papers, he carried them to a Government officer, and upon inspection it turned out that being invoices of the same goods received by the importer at the same time, they varied from those invoices which they presented at the custom-house and upon which they paid duties. It was those invoices of which the Senator from Massachusetts spoke the other day when he said that upon carrying them up to the business place of this firm and trying them upon the stubs of the book from which they had been torn they dovetailed and fitted exactly, so that there was no possible question that they come from there. That was the allegation. I say at this moment nothing as to the merits, as to how well or ill-founded was the allegation. I do not wish unnecessarily to be drawn into that, but the gravamen of the charge was upon the very point of knowledge by the importer; it was the scienter, it was the quo animo, it was the wicked information upon which it was said they acted which as I understood constituted the very essence of the allegation made in that instance.

My honorable friend by my side [Mr. HAMLIN] suggests that I should state that the allegation was that upon these invoices, private invoices as they were called, which were snatched by the clerk from the invoice-book and carried to the public agents, the goods appeared more valuable in the account-stated than upon the invoice on which duties were paid. Doubtless that was the fact. I supposed it appeared sufficiently in the statement I had made already; but the Senate will see, the Senator from Ohio will see, that so far from that case verifying the law as he now understands it, namely, that the guilt of some man in a foreign country of which the owner here was entirely innocent would subject the owner to forfeiture and punishment, in place of the case proving that, it proceeded upon the ground that forfeiture had been incurred by knowledge on this side growing out of the possession of an invoice received at the same time, on which the valuation of the goods was more than it was upon the invoice presented at the custom-house on which the duties were paid.

But, Mr. President, the existing condition of the law on this subject is not very important. We are asked to strike out the twelfth section of this bill. What is the law of that section? It is that whoever in this country—not elsewhere—shall willfully and knowingly commit perjury and fraud shall incur a certain forfeiture, more or less, and the question is what that forfeiture should be.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from New York allow me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. The question I wish to submit to the Senator from New York for information, is whether that provision of the twelfth section, should it become a law, in anywise affects the existing law except so far as that the forfeiture shall be of the article in respect to which the fraud is committed and not the whole invoice? To make my question perfectly clear, it is necessary to refer to the fourth section of the act of 1842 on this subject:

That the collectors of the customs shall cause at least one package out of every invoice, and one package at least out of every twenty packages of each invoice, and a greater number should he deem it necessary, of goods imported into the respective districts, which package or packages he shall have first designated on the invoice to be opened and examined, and if the same be found not to correspond with the invoice, or to be falsely charged in such invoice, the collector shall order forthwith all the goods contained in the same entry to be inspected; and if such goods be subject to ad valorem duty the same shall be appraised, and if any package shall be found to contain any article not described in the invoice—

or if such package or invoice be made up with intent by a false valuation—

No matter where that false valuation was made; it must necessarily have been made on the other side of the Atlantic or the Pacific—or extension or otherwise, to evade or defraud the revenue; the same shall be forfeited.

This section will forfeit not the whole invoice but the particular article. If I understand the point of the argument of the Senator from New York, it is that the fraud may be committed outside of the United States; and if this twelfth section becomes a law there will be no law to punish and prevent that fraud. I submit to him whether this section is not amply sufficient to prevent that, and whether the section I have read is repealed in any particular whatsoever, except that the forfeiture shall not be of the whole invoice, but only of the particular article?

Mr. CONKLING. I am obliged to the Senator from Ohio for calling attention to this.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to give notice that I will to-morrow morning, during the morning hour, ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the report of the conference committee on the currency bill, and I shall ask the friends of that report to stand by it until the report is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ought perhaps to remind the Senator from Indiana that the Senate to-day by unanimous consent has agreed that to-morrow at one o'clock the bills reported by the Committee on Military Affairs shall be called up by the Chair as unfinished business.

Mr. MORTON. I will proceed in the morning hour, and at the close of the morning hour the Senate can make its own disposition of the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To-morrow is the third day that has been fixed in succession for the bills of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I am glad attention has been called by the Senator from Ohio to the point he states in a query; glad because it has seemed to me all the time a very important matter not only by comparison with other things as here contained but in itself. My impression is very strong that the effect will be as the Senator indicated in one of the alternatives he stated, namely, to repeal the act to which he referred, and unless I have overlooked something, I think I can convince the Senator that that is the effect of this bill.

I wish to refer presently for another purpose to section 4 and therefore I will not read it now. The Senator from Ohio will look at it when he comes to it. But speaking now of section 12, I ask the Sentor's attention to this:

That any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make, or attempt to make, any entry of imported merchandise, by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement.

I have read far enough to show the Senator that it traverses the same general line of argument as the act to which he refers and provides a penalty in regard to it. Now if the Senator will turn over to section 29 he will find "that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed." When you describe an offense and provide a punishment and repeal all other statutes, the general rule certainly is that you occupy the ground with the new statute and you annul that which before operated upon the same subject in a different way.

The Senator will see if he will read the whole of this twelfth section, which I will not detain the Senate by doing, that not in one respect alone, but with great particularity in all respects of general scope, it covers the ground of the section to which he has referred.

But as I said I would refer to section 4 for another reason, I come to that now and I do it for the purpose, and I wish the Senator from Ohio would observe it, not of answering his question, but of showing, as I think I can show beyond peradventure, that under that section it is no offense; it is not smuggling, to bring in willfully, fraudulently, purposely, diamonds or merchandise to any extent whatever hidden away in other packages. If the section does not mean that I may lawfully, so far as this bill goes, smuggle a handful of diamonds in a chest of tea, if the chest of tea passes through the custom-house, then I cannot read the English language. My friend shakes his head. There is a great deal in his head when he shakes it; but I ask him to wait a little about that.

That whenever any officer of the customs or other person shall detect and seize goods, wares, or merchandise, in the act of being smuggled, or which have been smuggled, he shall be entitled, &c.

I pass on to the eighth line:

Provided—

Now comes a definition of smuggling, as the Senator from Ohio nearest me explained, to take the place of all the present definitions of smuggling.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I beg pardon.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, of the two definitions. Are there more than two?

Mr. SHERMAN. I said expressly, on the contrary, that this did not affect in the slightest degree the action against smuggling but it says expressly:

Provided, That for the purposes of this act—

That is, for the purpose of obtaining compensation for this service.

Mr. CONKLING. If my honorable friend will bear with me a moment he will see that he is only anticipating me. Of course it is "for the purposes of this act." I am coming to that. But first did he not tell us that for the purposes of this act this definition of smuggling was intended to take the place of the now prevailing definition? Certainly he did, and he need not have told us that, because we all know that that will be the effect of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator now think that this act or any word in it repeals the laws against smuggling?

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me for a moment, he will find out what I think. Had the Senator said that "for the purposes of this section," that should be the law, there would be a place for his argument to rest upon, at least as large as the sole of a dove's foot; but as it is now there is nothing, absolutely nothing for the argument to rest on as I think I can show. Let me see:

Provided, That for the purposes of this act—

That means every part of this act; does it not? My friend nods assent to that. I think we shall all agree that it means as well one section as another—for the purposes of this act, smuggling shall be construed to mean the act, with intent to defraud, of bringing into—

Nothing on the other side, the Senator will see, nothing in relation to the consignor, but confined wholly to the consignee and the importer—the act with intent to defraud of bringing into the United States, or with like intent attempting to bring into the United States dutiable articles, without passing the same or the package containing the same through the customs-house or submitting them to the officers of the revenue for examination.

Mr. SHERMAN rose.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend from Ohio will call my attention to these concluding words. They do not escape me, and if he rises for that purpose I beg him to forbear. Let me deal first with the preceding words.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are stricken out.

Mr. CONKLING. Stricken out?

Mr. SCOTT. The concluding words "or submitting them to the officers of the revenue for examination," have been stricken out.

Mr. CONKLING. "I thank" the Senator "for teaching me that word;" and if those words are stricken out of this section, I say not a doubt can be rested upon it that I may import ad libitum hidden diamonds or anything else, and if the package in which they are concealed passes through the customs-house, there is nothing in that section that will hold——

Mr. THURMAN. Now, will my friend allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I think that would be a very forced construction of this act, but as it is a penal act possibly it might obtain, though I do not think it would. But is there not a very plain remedy by striking out the words "or the package containing the same?"

Mr. CONKLING. There are plain remedies by striking out words, for all the aggravations of this bill, and I am making now one last attempt (which I know will be vain unless the Senator from Ohio will come to my succor here and there) to induce the Senate to correct some of those difficulties in the bill the presence of which here is imcomprehensible to me assuming that the bill has been prepared by any intelligent mind acquainted with the subject and honestly intent upon it. Undoubtedly the Senator from Ohio with only a small part of the facility which he has in the use of all language, and enacting language among others, can relieve this section and relieve other sections; but I comment upon it as it passed the House, as it has been accepted by the Committee on Finance, as it has been passed without condemnation, the chairman of that committee tells us, by the Secretary of the Treasury; and I say again measuring my expression that the late Secretary of the Treasury has in my judgment been summoned to answer no charge which has been sustained by proof against him so grave as the charge that he has taken this bill and subjected it, if he did, to his scrutiny as a lawyer and a sworn officer, and commended it to our lips as a safe enactment among the revenue laws of the Republic.

When the Senator from Ohio shall indicate his words, I shall be glad to vote for them, and they will assist this section very much. I am commenting upon it as it stands, and I say I will take the case of a box of tea, and I put a question to my friend from Vermont the precise force of which at the time he seemed to accept. I take the case of a box of tea in the middle of which a handful of diamonds has been concealed, and I say under this section as it stands if that box of tea is passed through the custom-house and submitted to the inspection of the custom-house officers, and the diamonds are afterwards discovered and the whole fact appears, it is not smuggling within the meaning of this section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will excuse me if I say to him that I did not misappreciate the force of what he was saying, but he will bear in mind that I was endeavoring to correct a false impression, as I believed it to be, of the Senator from Ohio as to the state of the existing law.

Mr. CONKLING. So I understood, and I say as a second comment upon the illustration I have put, that with the words suggested by my honorable friend from Ohio farthest from me, stricken out, still in the case I have put, the twelfth section will forfeit only the handful of diamonds and not even the box of tea in which they were concealed. It is to be only "the article," it would not even destroy the flavor of the tea.

Mr. BAYARD. To interrupt the Senator from New York a moment, I should like to ask him if the item which is forfeited in the illustration he has given us is not the only thing of value connected with it?

Mr. CONKLING. In the case of tea, it would be so.

Mr. BAYARD. Not only in the case of tea, but to go further, the suggestion has been made by other gentlemen who spoke on this subject prior to the Senator from New York that because a valuable item was mingled with others of inferior value, and the present law provides for a forfeiture of the item, ergo there must be a large default in the law. Now it seems to me, according to my reasoning and according to common sense, that if the Government shall secure the condemnation of the only article of value in the invoice, it is a matter of entire indifference whether the comparatively valueless articles that remain are condemned or not. In the case of the tea, if the Senator from New York shall secure the condemnation of the diamonds, will he stop to care for the condemnation of the tea? I think not. It would be a matter of small importance to him. Therefore it seems to me that where the inducement to commit this fraud is the passage through the custom-house of a valuable article in company with articles comparatively valueless, and you secure the condemnation of that which has value, it matters very little indeed if that which has no value shall go uncondemned. I do not think a stronger illustration could have been offered than that which the Senator from New York has offered himself. The diamonds are concealed in a box of tea; the tea is worthless, the diamonds of value; the diamonds are condemned and forfeited to the Government, and the useless teas are not. It seems to me that is not an objection.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us take some other illustration to see where the Senator's rule will lead us. I will take the case of a man who imports one hundred packages of silk, and in some of the packages he places costly lace. The duty on lace according to my recollection is 60 per cent. of the whole value. His silks are valuable, but he hides away in certain of these hundred packages costly lace. As has been said very often, the usage of the custom-house warranted by the statute is to pretend to examine only one case in ten. That examination is necessarily very casual. A piece of silk is not unrolled from beginning to end, for example. It is inspected and handled as well as it can be. Therefore the chance of discovery is very remote; but when discovery takes place what becomes of the argument of the Senator founded upon the illustration of a chest of tea? The lace is forfeited, 60 per cent. of the value being in the duties, and nothing else is forfeited. What is the inducement or the temptation held out to the importers or to the fraudulent consignor on the other side? Suppose he is caught one time in three, he is a great money-maker in the transaction. On the other hand, suppose when caught the entire invoice is forfeited, he would be a bold gambler upon the doctrine of chances who would sit down and say, "Because I am not to be caught more than one time in three, I will pursue this traffic." When you extend it to the whole invoice, if he is caught one time in ten, if he is caught one time in twenty, in average cases it would be fatal to him as a pecuniary speculation.

Mr. THURMAN. May I ask my friend how long would any importer maintain his standing and do his business who would do such a thing?

Mr. CONKLING. Perhaps not at this moment, but at a later moment, with the indulgence of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] to whom it was written, I should like to read a letter from Mr. Alexander T. Stewart, which letter I think will answer somewhat cogently the spirit of the question which the Senator from Ohio fartherest from me [Mr. THURMAN] now puts. I will say to the Senator that he who undervalues or he who cheats enough to be able by a little to undersell his neighbor can maintain himself perpetually in public estimation and in fact and in the estimation of everybody except A. T. Stewart, H. B. Claflin & Co., and other large dealers who, knowing that their facilities for cheapness are unsurpassed on the other side, will all the time feel an unerring conviction that there is fraud somewhere because they are undersold; but with them the knowledge will stop; and until one of these hated officers of customs clips with the long scissors of the law this system of undervaluation, it will go on as regularly and as certainly as the march of time.

But, Mr. President, I am being drawn into many matters of which I had no thought of saying a word and, therefore, I will proceed to the two or three topics to which I did mean to advert.

Taking the fourth section and the twelfth section together and reading in connection with both the eighth and ninth sections, my belief is that a great portion of all the cases of confessed revenue fraud are to go with impunity. By the eighth and ninth sections the owner or consignee need not appear at all; the broker does the business; and unless you can show falsehood in him and fraud in him these sections do not take hold; and so it seems to me—I will not dwell upon it; I have indicated sufficiently upon these points my understanding of the meaning of the bill—the effect is to be, upon matters having no reference whatever to moieties, no reference to the seizure of books, no reference to any real or pretended provisions complained of, to throw down the bars, to hoist the flood-gates and allow lax practice and fraud to range free and uncontrolled through these brittle cobwebs of the law.

But there is another thing about this twelfth section. All commissions paid in foreign countries, all inland freight, boxing, packing, incidental expenses which swell up very largely that value upon which duties are to be paid have no reference whatever to items; and in any such case, no matter how grievous under this section, as I understand it, no forfeiture whatever can occur. The Senator from Nevada, who stated with great force his objection to this section, overlooked I think the fact, which I now bring to his notice; that as to all importations from the British provinces, as to all importations from every country on the earth, no matter what fraud is committed touching the whole importation and not applying to particular items, no forfeiture is incurred; and yet a man who can avoid paying duties upon the commissions he pays abroad, upon inland transportation, upon boxing, packing, and incidental expenses, can undersell and break every honest dealer in the market. It is to me one of the marvels of this legislation that one of the familiar and stereotyped devices of fraud should be picked out and in the first place exempted from the section which works a forfeiture, and then treated in a separate section as if it was one of those youthful indiscretions for which the law should furnish guardianship, should furnish some clerk to go and add a correction afterward and call attention to.

Mr. STEWART. How are the officers to know about it?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, this bill shows, with the best intention on the part of many perhaps all of those who have been instrumental in putting it in its present shape, so many particulars in which it is crude, in which it is to be a disappointment and a harm, that I cannot but deplore the fact that we had not sent us a bill which would abolish moieties, abolish the seizure and inspection of papers, if that is right and I voted yesterday that it was right with some hesitation I admit, and there stop, doing one thing at a time, and leaving the residue of a revenue system to stand which has already been ripened by an experience older than the nineteenth century.

I spoke, Mr. President, of the vote of the Senate yesterday rejecting the section authorizing the seizure of books and papers, and as I have no intention of afflicting the Senate again and the matter occurs to me at this moment, I will explain the reason of my vote.

I am too old-fashioned, I am too much wanting in the keen sensibilities which prevail in these times to be shocked as I see others shocked by the idea that a man whose person is liable to arrest, that a man who may be seized by the strong hand of the law at midday or midnight and compelled to give bail or enter a dungeon, is liable for the same crime to have a court or an officer look at his business books; I say I am too old-fashioned to go into the spasms of propriety or the hysterics of virtuous indignation by which I see other people moved in this regard. I have no doubt of the power; I cannot doubt the propriety in proper cases and within proper limits of giving visitorial power as to secret invoices or false vouchers or other papers which persons charged with crime may have, when the proceeding is civil in its nature. I doubt neither the power nor the propriety. The details and circumstances of the arrangement are matters on which I do not stop to dwell. By a statute enacted in 1867—and I refer to section 3—that power was asserted, asserted with great efficiency, it has been said asserted with excessive efficiency. Waiving that question, the power was given by the act of 1867 to seize books and papers for what and under what circumstances? To seize them on the threshold of the proceeding, to seize them, if I may say so, the owner being unawares. Why? For what purpose? A moment's reflection will teach every one.

To-day ground of suspicion comes to a customs officer, or an officer of justice, that an act of smuggling has occurred. The suspicion may be wholly groundless; it may relate to the wrong man; there may be no man to whom it justly relates. Under the act of 1867 upon going ex parte to a judge and making that proof which should satisfy judicial discretion, the officer may be armed with the power to go instanter and get view of the papers of the suspected party. Everybody sees the pinch and, at the same time, the effect of that proceeding; every body sees that it answers the double purpose, first, of ferreting out the truth by an inspection too sudden to be expected, and, second, of advising officers in advance whether it is probably worth while to go on with the prosecution. Those are the two motives which defended, if it can be defended, section 3 of the act of 1867.

Now, Mr. President, what did the Committee on Finance propose? A section providing that upon an order to show cause, as the Senator from Pennsylvania called it, after a hearing, in a case already at issue, not a preliminary proceeding before a commissioner, but which has proceeded and ripened until was at issue in a district or circuit court, the judge may make an order after hearing that books and papers be produced. Who need be told, who is a tyro so young in the art of human deviation and depravity that he does not know that any smuggler if you let him know three or six months in advance that somebody may come after his books and papers, will not be likely to be possessed of inconvenient books or papers or those which will do a vast amount of harm to him or to posterity? Again, one of the anomalies of this bill is that all cases are to be investigated before a commissioner having jurisdiction of the case. No commissioner has jurisdiction of any civil case that can arise under this act. No commissioner has jurisdiction of any proceeding in rem or otherwise civilly. But who does not know that when in a proceeding before a commissioner, if one can be invented which he may entertain, you have shown probable cause, you have been able to ferret out the facts sufficiently to maintain an action, it is comparatively of little value, of doubtful necessity in a future stage of the proceeding to be allowed to go before the court and point out certain issues upon which a certain book, did you possess it, might be of value? That I am not wrong in this, let me read to show:

That in all suits and proceedings other than criminal arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States the attorney representing the Government, whenever in his belief any business book, invoice, or paper, belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant, will tend to prove any allegation made by the United States, may make a written motion, particularly describing such book, invoice, or paper, and setting forth the allegation which he expects to prove; and thereupon the court in which suit or proceeding is pending may, at its discretion, issue a notice to the defendant or claimant to produce such book, invoice, or paper in court, at a day and hour to be specified in said notice.

The Senate will see that the proceeding proposed by the committee can never be entertained as a preliminary proceeding, but only after the cause has gone to issue. Then upon a motion bringing expressly, as of course the action itself would bring actually to the knowledge of the possessor of a fraudulent book that unless he destroyed, concealed, or altered it, some minister of justice might attend him for the purpose of taking from him that which would be evidence against him, the order is to be made.

Mr. STEWART. I would suggest to the Senator from New York that that would take away the ordinary process and power of the court now to order the production of books and papers. It is a remedy that supplies the place of what now exists.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator may be answered by saying that referring to chancery analogies they do not embrace penal actions and qui tam actions any more than criminal proceedings, and that therefore with or without the statute no nourishment could be found in chancery practice in an instance of this kind. I do not stop to consider that. I have brought attention to this matter in order to explain as I have felt it would have been just to myself yesterday to explain my reason for voting against this provision authorizing the conditional seizure of books and papers. Many discerning persons have condemned it; a well-regulated public sentiment—and by a well-regulated public sentiment, I mean to distinguish between public judgment and mere heat and clamor—has visited with severe criticism the act of 1867 in so far as it authorizes the seizure of books and papers. It seemed to me yesterday hardly worth while to preserve in name and form an odious and in the estimation of many persons oppressive provision, so hampered, so regulated, so applied, so neutralized by other sections of the bill that really it would be hardly worth the enactment. It is an old maxim not known I believe to ethics but to a more drossy system of morals that whoever has the name should have the gain, and it seemed hardly worthwhile to re-enact this statute which has come to be odious if in connection with it we were to adopt proceedings which would paralyze or neutralize its effect.

Mr. PRATT. Will the Senator from New York allow me at this time to interrupt him upon the very point he is discussing? I understood him to say that a well-regulated public opinion had unqualifiedly condemned the law of 1867 authorizing the seizure of books and papers of a merchant for the purpose of being used against him?

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator interprets me rather strongly, but in that general direction I spoke.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Retrenchment in New York had occasion to take some testimony on that very question, and without detaining the Senator long I desire to read to him from the volume of evidence which I hold in my hand the testimony of H. B. Claflin, one of the most prominent merchants in the State of New York, and who testifies that his importations that year had been between eight and nine million dollars, or nine or ten millions, I do not remember which. His attention was called to this law. I will read now the questions and answers:

Question. Complaints have been made in regard to the seizure of books and papers of importers; have your books and papers ever been seized?

Answer. No, sir.

Q. Have you had complaints from the custom-house that your invoices were too low?

A. I do not think we ever had; none that came to my knowledge; I do not remember of any instance; there may have been instances in years past, but I do not remember of any.

Q. How do you regard the exercise of this law to seize books and papers for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is an attempted fraud on the Government? How do you regard that as affecting your interest?

A. It never has affected me at all, because my papers never have been seized. I have been asked to remonstrate frequently against this proceeding by petition, but I never have seen any petition. I told a man within two or three days, who asked me to sign such a petition, that I thought honest men had nothing to fear; my only fear was that they would not seize papers enough. Says he, "Suppose they seize your books?" "Very well," said I, "That is proper I should make every attempt to show it was all honest and right; and if I did so, I believe I should get out of it without trouble very quickly." I thought this prevented a great deal of fraudulent business; that is the proper time to seize papers. I do not know whether I am right about it.

I wanted to bring to the notice of the Senate the testimony of one of the largest importers in the city of New York on the very question my honorable friend was discussing.

Mr. CONKLING. I am obliged to the honorable Senator from Indiana for bringing out this bit of testimony and I beg to say that it comes from one of the purest, one of the wisest, and one of the most respectable men in the Republic, a man very largely instructed by culture and experience in his business and profession, and had I in his case, as I have in the case of Mr. Stewart, the written evidence of his opinion of this bill as it has been verbally reported to me, I think the Senator from Indiana would perhaps be as much impressed with that as he was by the bit of testimony he has read. There is the statement of a man knowing everything where I know nothing in this regard, clearly indicating his view of the value of the right to seize books and papers as a preliminary, before they have been changed, destroyed, or tampered with.

I have adverted, however, sufficiently to the section which did not prevail in the Senate yesterday, giving authority more or less in regard to books and papers. As I say, my vote against it did not rest upon a judgment that we had not the power and might not properly exercise it in proper cases, but it seemed to me hardly worth while in the midst of provisions like these to adopt a section, the benefit of which seemed to me likely to be so very little if appreciable at all.

Now I ask to have read a letter, of which I have heard frequently, addressed by Mr. A. T. Stewart, of New York, to the honorable Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance. He has been kind enough to loan it to me, and I beg Senators to listen to the reading of the letter and especially to some passages in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MERRIMON in the chair.) The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, May 26, 1874.

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor of 22d instant is received requesting information as to the probable effect of the passage of the House bill repealing all moieties allowed by the customs laws upon the revenue, &c.

Not having the bill before me, I am necessarily obliged to consider it as it is popularly understood, that it seeks to repeal all moieties as such to informers, to restrict if not abolish the seizure of books and papers in cases of alleged fraud, and to limit the forfeiture to the articles undervalued imposing a penalty for undervaluation, &c.

It is scarcely necessary for me to say to you that while our Government is under the necessity of imposing a high duty upon all imports, great inducements are offered to dishonest persons to evade the revenue laws; and as every successful effort must result in large gains, it follows that to prevent fraud heavy penalties must be imposed.

In no other way can the Government secure the income it requires; nor will anything less protect the honest importer against the frauds of unscrupulous men.

To meet these difficulties it is no doubt desirable that the laws should be so framed as while not unduly annoying the fair dealer shall operate to deter persons from attempting to evade their provisions; and the question then is presented whether the proposed bill will have such an effect. The experience of the past teaches us that we must not form our conclusions upon this subject on any theoretical views, but rather be controlled in a great degree by necessity, as unless detected fraud on the revenue laws is met by certain punishment it is useless for the honest importer to attempt to compete with the various schemes which will be set on foot by unprincipled parties willing to incur a risk where detection results only in slight punishment.

Now while I am not in favor of desiring to create by law a body of informers to whom there shall be held out inducements to pry into the business of others, yet I am unable to suggest any better system, so long as it is determined to retain our present high rate of duties; in other words continuing to offer any party who will furnish proof of fraud, a portion of the amount recovered by reason of his information. The portion or moiety to be set apart for this purpose is a matter causing much difference of opinion, but as it is desired that I shall express my own on the subject, I have to say that in no case except that of actual smuggling would I allow the informer exceeding 25 per cent. of the amount recovered. It seems to me this ought to be sufficient to stimulate effort, and at the same time is not so large a portion as to induce unfounded complaints. I am not, therefore, in favor of repealing all moieties or abolishing the system generally as now in practice. The power of seizure of books and papers of a party complained of, I do not object to, provided it is guarded by proper restrictions upon its exercise. The complaint should in no case be entertained upon a mere belief of any person willing to make an affidavit.

The fraud charged should be distinctly pointed out and before being brought to the attention of the judge for his action should have the certificate of the district attorney and the collector of the district to the effect that they have examined into the circumstances alleged and verily believe not only that they are true, but that a fraud has been actually and intentionally committed. Thus protected I believe no injustice could be perpetrated, or at least none such as has at times been heretofore complained of.

As to the amount of penalty to be imposed when fraud is established, I would favor confiscation of the articles undervalued with a fine of at least three times their actual cost or value, and I would not vest in any official discretionary power to lessen this punishment in the slightest degree or compromise any fraud after its detection. Adherence to this rule will, in my opinion, go further to prevent undervaluation, and attempted evasion of the customs laws, than any other measure that can be adopted.

For these reasons, and believing that the law proposed in its present form does not meet the emergency, I am not in favor of its passage without proper amendments.

If it can be so amended as to reach the difficulties I have indicated it is to be hoped that your committee will not hesitate to do so, and secure its passage during the present session. Certain it is that the honest importer stands much in need of governmental protection, and I trust he will get it at the hands of the present Congress.

Very respectfully, yours,

ALEX. T. STEWART.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, Chairman.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. I will yield if the Senator wishes, but I wish to make a remark about this letter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I supposed the Senator was through. The Senator from New York has gone on some time making statements in regard to this bill that I will not stop to answer, but I wish to speak to the Senate for a few moments in regard to the letter and the recommendations made by Mr. Stewart. My friend from New York will admit that he mentioned Mr. Stewart as a gentleman perfectly able to give us information in regard to this bill and he named others to whom I wrote also and had responses, and I now say to the Senator from New York that this bill conforms to every recommendation and every letter received by me.

Mr. CONKLING. Including this?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; including this. Besides that there was on the other side in favor of the passage of this bill a weight of recommendation, a weight of testimony that was overwhelming and now if the Senator will hand me that letter I will show him that we have practically carried——

Mr. CONKLING. My friend will pardon me. I was occupying the floor, which I will yield to him with pleasure, but it is rather awkward for me to have a letter taken out of my hand which I was having read as part of my remarks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought the Senator said he would conclude by reading the letter.

Mr. CONKLING. I said no such thing. I will yield with pleasure, but I think it would be better for my friend to occupy the floor in his own right. I had this letter read for the purpose of showing to the Senate, as I still venture to do despite the remark of the Senator, which surprises me somewhat, that Mr. Stewart with his large experience, with his obvious interests in favor of lax legislation as far as a man of honor could be so interested, disapproves entirely of some of the essential features of this bill, and especially of that which it is the pending motion to strike out. What does the Senator from Ohio mean by saying that the bill conforms to the suggestions made in this letter? Let me read in respect of the twelfth section, as that is now undergoing review:

> As to the amount of penalty to be imposed when fraud is established, I would favor confiscation of the articles undervalued—

This bill does that; does it not? So far it conforms; but what more does it say—> with a fine of at least three times their actual cost or value.

Mr. SHERMAN. We make a fine of $5,000, which would be more than three times in every case probably.

Mr. CONKLING. I mean to receive everything with respect that comes from so distinguished a Senator, and I do not suppose he means to insult my understanding by the remark he now makes. What can the Senator mean by his observation that a fine not to exceed $5,000 conforms to this recommendation?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say that in ninety-nine cases in one hundred—and I should rest it with the Senator from New York—the article imported is under the value of a thousand dollars rather than over. It is a very rare case indeed that a detection is made of an article beyond a thousand dollars, and the fine here is not less than $5,000.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, if my friend will pardon me, he is just as accurate in the last statement he makes as he is in the rest. On that we cannot differ. The Senator has just said that the fine is to be at least $5,000. Did he not say that?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I said the maximum of the fine is $5,000.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend is quite intent and engaged in this, and he does not weigh as carefully as usual what he says.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator may want to pick up some word; but I repeat to him now, and understand what I say, that in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred this penalty is more than three times the value of the article. There is no use in picking out words if I dropped a word which I did not mean. I say now we followed the advice of Mr. Stewart. That letter was read in committee verbatim et literatim, and we sought to carry out that advice as being the advice of a gentleman who desired the most guards thrown around the bill, and we framed the third section of the bill as to the seizure of papers in pursuance of his opinion, and we put in this very clause of confiscation now proposed to be stricken out, according to the very idea suggested by Mr. Stewart, that the confiscation should be confined to the article, and we considered the $5,000 fine named in this section as three times the value of the article in the great body of cases. There might be cases where it would be much more than three times the value of the article sought to be imported frequently.

Mr. CONKLING. If I have been betrayed into any warmth about this matter in any degree offensive to my honorable friend from Ohio, I beg to assure him that it was quite inadvertent. This is not a matter which need to be treated with declamation; it is a very cold matter of business. It is not personal to him or to me in any sense whatever, and we may as well consider it cooly and collectedly.

I said that my honorable friend was as accurate when he stated that the fine must be at least $5,000 as he was when he said that that fine was in accordance with Mr. Stewart's recommendation that it would be three times the value of the goods. That I repeat. The Senator from Ohio a few moments ago took the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co. to illustrate: that firm we are told paid $271,000 for what? As the precise value, as the record shows, of the tainted or undervalued items.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; of the invoices and so forth.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend takes me up on this statement, too.

Mr. SHERMAN. There were only $1,600 of undervaluation.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend takes me up on the statement that that compromise consisted of the tainted items. I do not like to bandy assertions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said there was $1,600 of duties due.

Mr. CONKLING. We cannot both do this as well as I can alone, if we talk at the same time, and I shall do it worse than any other single member of the Senate would. My friend has joined issue with me because I said that the sum which Phelps, Dodge & Co., paid, to wit, $271,000, was the total of the tainted items. We understand that issue. Now I will turn over and see whether it was or not, and I think I may appeal to save time to the Senator from Delaware as he and I looked together over this matter yesterday and I will make a statement of the fact as I understand it and I beg the Senator from Delaware to correct me if I am wrong.

The total of the invoices in which alleged undervaluation occurred was over $1,700,000. The value of the undervalued items was first footed up at $261,000; an error was made in the computation, and it turned out to be $271,000. Thereupon a compromise was suggested by some of the counsel acting for this business firm upon the basis of paying the amount of the tainted items, and I use the expression "tainted" only because I find it used here in the testimony by the district attorney, Judge Davis himself. I ask the Senator from Delaware whether I am right in my statement so far.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes; excepting that I should say this to the Senator: the statement is taken from Mr. Dodge about it. Mr. Dodge did not know at the time his statement was made how many invoices were included or how many items were included. In other words, the basis of the demand on him was not made known to him, and he never knew until this letter was handed subsequently that the undervaluation on all these invoices had amounted to $6,000 and that the deficit of duties was $1,600. He says distinctly that had such facts come to his knowledge he never would have made the settlement he did.

Mr. CONKLING. I will yield to my friend again, and I beg him not at this moment to load this point with irrelevant matter.

Mr. BAYARD. I only wanted to answer.

Mr. CONKLING. Before we depart from this I want to fix and nail my own error, if it is my error, and the error of the Senator from Ohio, if it is his, in this regard. My statement was that Phelps, Dodge & Co. paid a sum which was exactly the total of the so-called tainted items in the invoices.

Mr. BAYARD. That was the result.

Mr. CONKLING. Precisely so. Now, if we can stop right there, I refer to the matter for no purpose except to solve this question. What was that? It was a settlement precisely on the basis proposed in section 12, was it not, forfeiting not the invoices but the articles in which the alleged undervaluation consisted?

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I ask the Senator, in order to settle whether he or I be right, how many packages there were in all those invoices and all those importations, so as to ascertain how many offenses were committed under the twelfth section, and then we will divide that number of packages by the amount undervalued, by the whole amount of $271,000, and then you get the average value of each package.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me, when it is necessary to calculate an eclipse to find out whether I was right or not on this point, I will stop and calculate it. Now, I stand by my own proposition, and I insist upon it that when the record sustains me I shall not be put down or snowed under by mere assertion. The Senator from Ohio commenced by saying that Mr. Stewart's advice that three times the amount of the articles undervalued should be imposed as a penalty had been followed out in this bill, and he said $5,000 would do it. To illustrate the fallacy of that, I referred to the case to which he had referred and I affirmed that $271,000 paid by that firm was exactly the total of the alleged tainted items in the invoice, or in the language of this bill, the total of the articles in which the undervaluation had occurred. I turn to the record and it is manifest, and the Senator from Delaware confirms me, that that was the precise fact. Now let us try the Senator' arithmetic. Two hundred and seventy-one thousand dollars would be the forfeiture under this bill. Why? Because that is the total of the articles in which the alleged fraud or undervaluation took place. The Senator from Ohio says that when you provide that a fine may be recovered which shall not exceed $5,000, you have answered Mr. Stewart's recommendation that the fine shall be three times the value of the articles undervalued. Is that true? What would be three times $271,000? If my friend who went into equations a moment ago, with his excellent arithmetic, would be kind enough to tell me how much is three times $271,000, I shall be able to tell him exactly how much fine imposed in that case, assuming that it was a case of guilt, would satisfy the recommendation of Mr. Alexander T. Stewart.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Eight hundred and thirteen thousand dollars.

Mr. CONKLING. Eight hundred and thirteen thousand dollars would have been the fine in that case according to Mr. Stewart. According to this bill it could not have exceeded $5,000, and yet the honorable Senator having it in charge tells us that it corresponds and conforms with the recommendation of Mr. Stewart.

Mr. Stewart says:

As to the amount of penalty to be imposed when fraud is established, I would favor confiscation of the articles undervalued—

That the bill does—with a fine of three times their actual cost or value.

That is three times the whole actual value of the items, no matter how minute the undervaluation may be.

Mr. THURMAN. May I ask the Senator from New York a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. Then Mr. Stewart would be a great deal more severe than the present law.

Mr. CONKLING. So I was going to say. My friend anticipated me.

Mr. THURMAN. Infinitely more severe than the present law. The present law forfeits the whole invoice. The undervalued articles might be three-fourths of the invoice and the effect of that proposition would be far more severe. Now, if I am not interrupting my friend and taking up too much of his time, allow me to ask him a question. The Government would have been defrauded in the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co. of about $1,600 of duty. Forfeiting the articles imposed on them, the forfeiture being $271,000, a penalty about eighteen times the duty, to which this bill adds $5,000 more. Apart from Mr. Stewart's opinion, I leave it to the Senator from New York to say if eighteen times the amount of the duties is not a sufficient penalty?

Mr. CONKLING. I answer the Senator. In the first place I answered him that under this twelfth section, Phelps, Dodge & Co. would have paid precisely what they did, $271,000, and the fine in addition if it could have been recovered, provided by this section in that case. The Senator says that the effect of the law was to confiscate eighteen times the amount and the fine imposed by the bill besides. That was an inadvertence; he did not mean that; he means to confiscate the whole invoice, and upon that I have this very frank answer to give: I observed the statement of the same Senator yesterday that one objection to this system of forfeiture was not only the severity but the disparity of consequences and punishments. Bearing all that in mind, I answer the Senator that wherever an error is inadvertent and careless merely, I should be against any serious penalty. But turning from these cases to the instances of deliberate, studious, willful fraud, I say that whether the forfeiture be eight or eighteen times the amount of property with which the fraud was committed, there is nothing in it which shocks my sense of justice.

Mr. President, whoever in the night-time shall set fire to or burn the inhabited dwelling-house of another, there being therein at the time some human being, shall die upon a gibbet, according to the laws of the Commonwealth from which I come; and when a girl, belonging to a race which is termed inferior, Rose Butler, had put a shovelful of coals upon the stair leading from the kitchen to the upper stories of a house, and from those coals enough charring took place to satisfy the words of the indictment, which my friend so well remembers, when the combustion and the consumption had taken place, although it burned only the stairs, a crime had been committed for which the laws of the State of New York said that girl should be hung by her neck until she was dead. No Christian civilization was ever shocked by this.

So you can put manifold cases in which in particular instances the punishment seems enormous; it seems to overtop cruelty itself when measured in reality by the act done. But, Mr. President, laws are made for the benefit of society. Penalties are inflicted not in vengeance, but among other things to deter others; and so laws denouncing capital punishment set bloody buoys floating on the sea of life, warning all to keep aloof from the temptation which ends upon upon the scaffold or the block.

So here. Every government has a right to be. It has the right of self-defense. It has the right to vindicate its supremacy in the presence of emergencies, no matter how great. As Judge Story said, and as was said by the great Chief Justice who sat with him, the power to levy taxes and to enforce their payment rigidly and thoroughly, is the most essential, if it be not the most towering attribute of sovereignty. Now, when the sappers and miners begin, when men guilty of intentional perjury and fraud set their wits to work by demoralizing devices to pilfer from the realm, to destroy honest competition, to undermine their rivals, to cheat the revenue, to swindle the State, to inflict untold injury upon the community, that crime of perjury, which when committed by any man in the presence of his Maker upon his soul has been in every civilization that was Christian regarded as a crime crimson with infamy, becomes more gigantic and more atrocious by reason of the evil which it seeks to do, by reason of the great purpose of harm for which it is contrived. Therefore I say to my honorable friend from Ohio, show me the case of a perjurer, show me a man who, afraid of the honest competition and generous rivalry of business, seeks by fraud, surreptitiously to destroy the interest and the business of his neighbor, to make himself ill-gotten gains by the act at once of robbing the State and perjuring his own soul, and I will show you a case where, if the law told him beforehand how many dollars and how many cents he bet upon that game, the gambler when he has lost, need not apply for compassion to me. I will show you, sir, a hundred cases, with which the records of criminal courts bristle every year, where an invocation goes up for convicts such as can never, for a smuggler, plead for that mercy which "seasons justice."

No, sir; wanting, I am afraid, somewhat in tenderness of heart, when my honorable friend from Ohio would arouse the few feeble gentle sensibilities left to me, I beg him to depict some object of suffering, some subject of injustice not to be found among the smugglers, the perjurers, or the thieves to whom his question may relate.

Mr. THURMAN. What question?

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend, meaning perhaps that as I have been somewhat lost in the mazes of metaphysical conclusions, chides me with the intimation that he has forgotten the question he put. I do not blame him; I understood him to inquire whether my sense of justice or of mercy was not shocked by the idea that eighteen times the value of the goods smuggled might be forfeited if the smuggler was caught?

Mr. THURMAN. That was not the question.

Mr. CONKLING. Preferring, if my friend will pardon me, not to go into particular cases which are of no value except as illustrations, I answer him that in a case of guilt I have no compassion. If he will find me a case where guilt does not exist, then it is not the case of which I am speaking.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the committee, said, if I understood him, that the present bill conformed to the views of Mr. Stewart in respect to the power of the seizure of books and papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will allow me, in the direction in which he has just been speaking about the adequacy of the punishment for undervaluations, &c., and in connection with the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co., which is the capital on which the enterprise of this bill proceeds in the business of legislation, I should like to have the Secretary read from the official copies from the books of Phelps, Dodge & Co., voluntarily surrendered, as it is here stated, for examination on the 27th of December, 1872, the record which no doubt illustrates the strength of this bill in protecting the innocent virtue of these people against the cruel tyranny of the officials of the United States better than any amount of rhetoric, even from the mouths of the distinguished orators who support this bill, can do. The headings are—and then I will ask the Secretary to read the rest——

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather my friend would not have that read until I have a chance to reply to the honorable Senator from New York when he gets through. I hope he will not put in a speech at this point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no; I am not putting in a speech.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, a document.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In order to illustrate, with the consent of the Senator from New York, the precise point he was discussing with the Senator from Ohio, I am asking his permission that there shall be read in connection with his remarks this official copy and statement from the books of Phelps, Dodge & Co., furnished by themselves, and therefore I presume truthful, of the species of virtuous enterprise in which they were engaged for the benefit of morality and the advantage of trade. Does the Senator from Ohio object to that?

Mr. CONKLING. I do not object to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wanted to see if the Senator from Ohio did.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think to have a long document read and interposed in a debate like this is rather outside of the question. I want to reaffirm what I said and to prove that in the very cases cited, taking each offense, the twelfth section of this bill provides a superior penalty. That is the question between us. It is a question now of the correctness of figures.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator undoubtedly will have time for that, and in order to aid him (because I must do good to him even against his will, if I have the right to do that) in coming to this question of accuracy I will give him the exact entries in the books of these innocent people whom our agents have so cruelly wronged, and which has brought forty millions of people to blush with shame, I believe somebody said, in order that he may see precisely how the thing occurred. If it is not precisely in point, as it appears to me, it will at least be—and the Senator will agree with me so far—useful in another way. The learned Mr. Saunders, who always hated the civil law, as the Senator well knows, and who was a great common-law lawyer, in arguing a great case one day before the court of king's bench found it greatly to his advantage to cite an authority from the civil law; but inasmuch as he was a known opponent of the civil law and insisted that it ought never to be introduced in principle or practice into the jurisprudence of Great Britain, he found it difficult to preserve his consistency in referring to the authority; but he got round it, as the Senator from Ohio would on a similar occasion, after he had produced his Justinian or his institute or his digest, or whatever it was, by saying, "If it please your honors, I bring this to your honors' notice, not as an authority in our law, but as an ornament to discourse." [Laughter.] Now, if this inventory is not precisely in point to the view of my honorable friend from Ohio, certainly it will be a flourishing ornament to the discourse that he is to make about the virtue of Phelps, Dodge & Co.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is very well put.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have put it just as the invoice does; it has two faces. [Laughter.]

This invoice, I say, is the real, genuine thing as it appears from the Treasury Department, a statement of the contents of the books of Phelps, Dodge & Co. surrendered by them voluntarily in the exuberance of their established virtue for examination between the 25th of December, 1872, and the 1st of January, 1873, that holy Christmas time when all the world is glad that honor, virtue, and prosperity are spreading themselves all over the world. It is headed first "date." It is put in a tabulated form, which, to be sure, interferes with the rhythmical unity which the transaction itself so really deserves to be put in; but it is put in tabulated form and I must take it, as I am not a minnesinger, as it is. The Senator from Ohio, no doubt, can put it into measure, which will make it much more agreeable reading than it is now. Here it is. First is the column of the date of the entries in their books. Second is the name of the vessel in which the importation was made. Third is the mark which each package had put upon it for identification. Fourth is the description of the contents of each package of goods. Fifth is the custom-house invoice, a bland and delicious name, implying of course that everything is public and fair, that the open door of the public buildings of the Government where the appointed officers sit at the customs are to be emblazoned by this statement put up by Phelps, Dodge & Co. as the real cost of their property which they had brought into the country. Then next comes what the Senator from Ohio may think is a peculiarity, the private invoice. Next comes the difference in value between the two, and then the total amount of the invoice.

I will not of course take up the time of the Senate in reading it clear through, but I will take one or two specimens just to illustrate how it runs. On the 28th of January, 1871, by the City of London, came a package marked S in diamond, and carrying an Asiatic name, I suppose. I believe the island of Banca furnishes some tin; if I am wrong about that my honorable friends of the Finance Committee can correct me; I do not profess to be wise in tin, either in the metaphorical sense of dollars, or in the commercial sense of the article these gentlemen dealt in; but the word is Pontymister, and I suppose it to be a manufactory in the island of Banca. Very likely I am wrong, but if so, I can be corrected. Then come the goods, "171 boxes tin plates 2 b B. T." How thick that is the Senator from Ohio can inform us. Then comes the custom-house invoice, and the entry in pounds, shillings, and pence is £531 11*s.* 0*d.* Then comes the "private invoice, £548 13*s.* 0*d.*; difference in value, £17 2*s.*"

Here, then, you have a firm of people whose wrongs are to be redressed by this bill, who have been made the innocent victims of a cruel and illegal tyranny, who hold out to the United States and swear to it one paper which affirms that the cost of that article of tin was £531 11*s.*, while they receive and post in the same book of invoices, so that the two are brought side by side, another invoice, which is the true one, stating that the cost of that article was £548 13*s.* In one hundred and seventy-one boxes of tin the cause of virtue and good morals and public revenue and the progress of society require the virtuous citizen to declare, for the purpose of taxation, that the cost is one sum, and for the purpose of his private gain, to have the truth, that the cost is a greater sum by £17, and to swear to the false invoice as the true one. That is what the honorable Senator from Ohio evidently considers to be a virtuous example for a good citizen who intends to promote the welfare of trade and honesty toward his brother importers and good morals in society everywhere to set.

Mr. President, I did not rise to comment upon this sort of thing. I am only stating the case, word for word and letter for letter, according to the examination of these books, the authenticity of which was not questioned, surrendered by this firm itself, where the members of the firm swear to the custom-house officer that the cost was one sum, when by their own invoice and in their own books, side by side with it, is the true invoice, which confessedly was the true sum, a great deal larger.

The statement from which I have quoted, from the books of Phelps, Dodge & Co., is as follows:

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps my friend having the paper before him will answer the only question I care about. Having made a statement on this subject, I want to know whether I am right or not. The paper that I have here gives the custom-house value of each invoice stated in its place. I have a printed copy of the same list, as I am informed. I will ask the Senator whether on the average the custom-house value on each invoice is not less than one-third of $5,000?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will answer the Senator, although it is a subject that I have not examined in that point of view, but I can give him the substance of my answer.

Mr. SHERMAN. I only ask generally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can give him the substance of my answer, and it is certainly perfectly pertinent, by an illustration. I remember there was once tried in my county on an indictment by a grand jury—the Senator begins to smile; he imagines the answer will be in his favor; but he is mistaken. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt the answer will be very funny, but I should like to have a direct answer to the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A man who had previously borne a very good reputation in a community where I once practiced law happened to be suspected by some informer, some Jayne or other, of committing forgery. He was indicted and he was brought to trial before a traverse jury of twelve good men, his peers, and the evidence proved that there had been an instance or two of that kind in the course of the man's recent life. He had always been a good fellow before, but the temptation overtook him of undertaking to carry on a larger business than his neighbors. It needed capital to do it, and as he had not the recent patent contrivance of having the Government issue as much as he wanted, he accordingly got it out of bank by forging his neighbor's signature. It was rather a hard case to get over. The counsel for the respondent, like my good friend here, addressed the jury in this way: "Gentlemen of the jury, it may be true that in this particular instance this man has committed these two acts of forgery; but, gentlemen of the jury, I want you to take into consideration the whole course of his career and tell me if on an average he has not been as honest as anybody." [Laughter.]

The jury did not take that view of it. I dare say in this case they may. Here being a case of admitted false invoices running to the number of forty or fifty; I do not know how many; I do not know how many more there may be; there being no excuse that ever I heard of for such a state of things—the honorable Senator would no more be a party to such a thing as that than he would cut off ten thousand heads if he had them—when these facts are brought to the knowledge of the Senate of the United States, not for the purpose of pursuing this firm, I beg them to understand; but when their wrongs are brought forward as the cause for legislation we are compelled to look into them, and the honorable Senator turns you off and says "after all it is a question of general average. How are you to foot this thing up?"

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, still he has not answered the question. I am not the defender of Phelps, Dodge & Co. They are not my constituents, nor have I anything to do with them. A question arose between the Senator from New York and myself, and I say now the penalty recommended by Mr. Stewart is exceeded in amount in this particular case, taking this particular case that is used by the Senator from New York as an illustration; that in each case the penalty provided in this bill exceeds that proposed by Mr. Stewart. That is the point I want to get at. Take each of these offenses of which Phelps, Dodge & Co. are said to be guilty; I know nothing about them; and I say the penalty under this bill exceeds that suggested by Mr. Stewart.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Even as dull as I am I understand the Senator very well, if he will pardon me, and if he will have patience I will come to him, although that affair is not my quarrel, but that of a Senator from a State almost as large as Ohio; I do not know but larger; I do not know how that is between the two honorable Senators; but I will speak of it, if I am not taking too much of the time of the Senator from New Yerk, in a minute.

The Senator says he is not the defender of Phelps, Dodge & Co. I beg to know if I am mistaken in the supposition that I have entertained that this bill was being pushed here on account of the wrongs that had been committed by the Government of the United States or its agents against this very firm in respect of these transactions among others? Will anybody say that it has not been? I should not have dragged the name of any private citizen into this discussion, however guilty he might be. The tribunals of his country, if he had found it convenient to submit himself to them, would have been able to ascertain whether he was guilty or not, and I should have been the last man I hope, or among the last, who would ever have referred to the guilt or innocence of anybody who might be suspected or charged with crime in a place where he could not have the opportunity to answer or be tried. But these parties not being in court, having got out of court in a way that we all understand, right or wrong, when it is said they are virtuous and that the law as it stands has been made an instrument of tyranny and oppression in defrauding innocent citizens of their just and constitutional and business rights, then I am forced to see what the truth really is.

It does not do therefore for the Senator to say that the matter of Phelps, Dodge & Co. has nothing to do with this business and he is not their defender. He is promoting this bill upon the ground that the law as it stands has been made the instrument of tyranny against these men; that it has been the engine of oppression, not because the law as it stands was right and had been violated by the acts of Jayne and the Secretary of the Treasury and the district attorney. Nobody contends that they went one step beyond the law; but he says that the law has undertaken to interfere with the business of innocent and virtuous citizens who have not been guilty of any violation of it, unless it may be a technical one which is pressed to their disadvantage. Therefore I say I am forced to point to the moral of what was so well said by the Senator from New York, and to ask your attention to the undisputed fact, sad as it is, that in the books of this company, side by side, systematically placed there, are found invoices of this great article of trade, the difference of a shade in the price of which enables a great house to command the trade of the country and destroy that of their competitors; not one instance, not ten, not twenty, but a hundred, where there is this continuous falsehood from day to day deliberately entered, the truth upon one side and the falsehood upon the other; the false invoice every time presented and sworn to at the Department, and the true one every time placed by the copy of the false one in the books of this firm in order that their private transactions might be guided by it.

If that is the virtue that the Senator defends, it is not mine. If that is the public prosperity which he wishes to promote, it is not a prosperity in which I wish to share. I know it is not that in which the Senator wishes to share; but he has been carried away, as we are all sometimes carried away on the wind of a clamor, and in order to overcome clamor he destroys the fundamental foundations upon which Alexander Hamilton and the fathers of the Republic placed the law in order to protect innocence and to punish vice.

Mr. CONKLING rose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will pardon me, I will attend to the Senator from Ohio on the other point.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to attend to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. CONKLING. I will promise to relieve the Senate in a very few moments; but before taking my seat, as I have now had the opportunity to look at the record, I want to set at rest, if I can, the issue between the Senator from Ohio and myself. Now, by his inquiry of the Senator from Vermont, he indicates that he reads or wants us to read the letter of Mr. Stewart as if he proposed to forfeit three times the undervaluation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Three times the whole.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, then, three times the whole. If the Senator will stand by that while I can read from the record, I will read. This is what Mr. Stewart says;

I would favor confiscation of the articles undervalued, the whole articles, with a fine of at least three times their actual value.

Mr. President, notwithstanding the amusement of my friend, for I see he is amused, I will venture to read from the record, which I borrow from the Senator from Pennsylvania, the testimony taken in the House. I read from the statement of Judge Noah Davis, then the attorney of the United States for the southern district of New York where this transaction took place. I will abbreviate it until I come to the point. Mr. Davis says that some time after this matter came to light he was sent for to go down to the Astor House one evening. At the Astor House he met Mr. Knox and Mr. Wakeman, two of the counsel for Messrs. Phelps, Dodge & Co., Judge Fullerton, another of their counsel, and I may say a lawyer of distinction, having been a judge of the highest court in the State of New York, subsequently came in, and at that time occurrences took place, the narrative of which I read from this evidence:

I went down there and found Mr. Jayne there, and Mr. Knox, and Mr. Wakeman, who were the counsel for Phelps, Dodge & Co. Mr. Jayne told me that there had been a proposition of compromise in the Phelps, Dodge & Co. case, by the payment of $150,000, but which, however, he was not willing to accept, as it was not enough. He then said to me that they had sent for me for the purpose of inquiring as to how the matter, if arranged, could be at once closed up without any further proceedings—meaning, of course, without the necessity of sending the proposition of settlement to Washington for approval before its acceptance; to which I replied that the collector would probably not approve of anything they did unless it was based upon some principle which had been adopted before as a basis of action in such cases; and I then said to them that heretofore, in some cases, the practice had been adopted—

I ask the Senator to mark this passage—of selecting some invoice or invoices about equal to the sum which was offered, and directing a suit for that amount to be commenced by the district attorney, and on his commencing a suit for that amount demanding that sum, on the party coming into court and offering that sum, in the nature of a cognovit or judgment, judgment could be immediately taken for that amount and the matter disposed of without delay.

That was one way of doing it. Now I beg the Senate to observe the other:

Mr. Jayne remarked that he recollected three cases in which that had been done. The other course was to select from the invoices the tainted items, if I may so describe them, and order suit for their value, and after the suit was commenced, for the party to appear and give consent to a cognovit. These two courses I suggested had been adopted on several occasions by collectors. Thereupon Mr. Jayne was requested (not by me, but by the counsel for Phelps, Dodge & Co.) to ascertain the amount of those items that were alleged to be affected.

Those are the "articles" we are talking about in the language of Mr Stewart, are they not? Those items affected Mr. Jayne was requested to ascertain the total of.

He sat down and figured up the amount, I recollect now—in conformity to his recollection, (for he told me yesterday that I had fallen into a little error there)—that the invoices were not all present, but he went through the mass of invoices that were present. The other gentlemen went into another room, and I sat there looking through the newspapers while Mr. Jayne was examining the figures. He went through the papers that he had there, and then announced that he had not all of them there; but that the result was, estimating that those not present would produce substantially the same result as those present, that the aggregate amount would be $260,000.

The aggregate amount of what? Of the tainted items?

Mr. BECK. At that interview was there any one else present except you, Mr. Jayne, Mr. Knox, and Mr. Wakeman?

Mr. DAVIS. I was going on to tell you about that, and I shall name a gentleman who came in subsequently. Mr. Jayne reported this sum to me. I was astonished at its magnitude, and said that Phelps, Dodge & Co. would never pay any such sum as that. He replied that they would. Then the counsel were called for, and they came in, and at that time Mr. Fullerton, a partner of Mr. Knox, came in also, saying that he had just got out of court, which was the reason he had not been in before. Then the amount was given. Jayne gave the figures. The counsel looked over the figures and retired, as I understood to go to the room where Mr. Dodge and Mr. James were, neither of whom I saw on that occasion. After a little they came back, saying that they were ready to pay the sums ascertained, and Jayne said that that was not an absolute sum, but an approximate one, and that if in looking over the thing more accurately it should turn out to be less, it was understood that a reduction was to made; and if it turned out that the items aggregated more, an increase was to be made in the sum. Then I was requested to go to my office, and wait the sending up of a letter from the collector to commence that suit, and they went (Jayne and, as I understand, the counsel for Phelps, Dodge & Co.) to the custom-house to procure the collector's action in the case. I was requested to wait at my office for one hour and not to leave before, and that if they did not get around before that time, I was asked to take a capias to my house, so that they might come there in the evening.

The Senate will see from this—and if it would be more satisfactory I will turn over and read, though I suppose it is not necessary, the testimony showing the point at which they discovered that the total in place of being $260,000 was $271,000 when the other invoices were brought in—the Senate will see that the $271,000 was the exact value, in the language of Mr. Stewart, "of the articles undervalued;" so that three times that amount would have been over $800,000.

Mr. STEWART. The fine was three times that.

Mr. CONKLING. I know that; but I will not stop for it. I want to show my friend from Ohio that I did not intend to misstate him, and that I could not possibly have done it, and therefore when he asks the Senator from Vermont whether $5,000 would not be three times as much as some amount which he mentions, everybody must see that he forgets the language and idea of Mr. Stewart which, applied to that case, would have required three times $271,000 to be paid.

There I leave that matter; and I beg to assure my friend that I have not intended to put him in any false position, and I hope I have not done so.

I wish now before sitting down to call attention, as I began to do a few moments ago, to the ideas of Mr. Stewart touching the seizure of books, in order that we may know whether my honorable friend from Ohio is borne out in his statement that the bill as reported by his committee conformed to the ideas of Mr. Stewart. That section as reported, as I have before had occasion to say, provided that after the proceeding had gone into court in its latter stages, on motion made, books might be produced. See what Mr. Stewart says:

> The power of seizure of books and papers of a party complained of I do not object to, provided it is guarded by proper restrictions upon its exercise.

What are those restrictions? Waiting for four or five months and on motion bringing them in afterward? Let us see:

> The complaint—

Mark the word—

> The complaint should in no case be entertained upon a mere belief of any person willing to make an affidavit. The fraud charged should be distinctly pointed out, and before being brought to the attention of the judge for his action should have the certificate of the district attorney and collector of the district to the effect that they have examined into the circumstances alleged, and verily believe not only that they are true, but that a fraud has actually and intentionally been committed. Thus protected, I believe no injustice could be perpetrated, or at least none such as has at times been heretofore complained of.

What does that mean? Is it not palpable to everybody that it means that he is in favor of a power to seize and inspect books and papers on a complaint being made, requiring nothing except that the affidavit should be upon something more than mere belief, and that it should be accompanied by a certificate of the collector and district attorney? Side by side with that recommendation we have a provision in the bill that afterward, necessarily weeks afterward, after the party has been served with process, after he has become an active party litigant, upon motion of which he is to have notice, resort may be had to his books and papers. Why, sir, there is some similarity. There is a certain similarity between a pebble and a mountain. Both have magnitude, and both may be of flint. So both these sections relate to books, and that general likeness prevails; but my friend from Ohio will warrant me in saying, every man who has ever practiced law will know without my saying, that between such a provision as the bill proposes and the recommendation of Mr. Stewart, there is a difference just as great as between that which is utterly weak and that which is utterly strong, that which is impotent and will fail nineteen times in twenty and that which with efficient vigor is intended to catch and will catch offenders unawares between wind and water, and detect them nine times in ten if in truth they are guilty.

I apologize, Mr. President, for the much time I have occupied, which I assure the Senate was no part of my intention when I rose; and I leave this subject after remarking that if I shall be compelled to vote for this whole bill as it is, in order to vote to abolish moieties and to get rid of the seizure clause in respect of books, I shall take a bill containing in my belief very much of harm, because it is the only way in which I can obtain the chief object which this general legislation has in view; and I have deemed it right and just to myself to put on record that which will defend me hereafter from the allegation that I had supposed all parts of this measure, should I vote for it, were such, take each by itself, as to warrant that vote or exonerate me from blame in not calling attention to them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments in replying to some remarks made by the Senator from New York, and I shall do it more in justice to the committee of which I am a member than to myself.

The idea seems to have been entertained or promulgated by the Senator from Vermont a moment ago that we were impelled in reporting this bill, or in our action in this matter, in some respect by the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co. I assure the Senator that the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co. is but an item in the whole matter. It did not influence our action in the slightest degree. I have known Phelps, Dodge & Co. as very eminent merchants for a great many years, I think for fully thirty years by name and reputation. As to their private history and all that, I certainly have no interest in them, nor care for them; nor, so far as I can remember, was any mention made or consideration given to their case by the Committee on Finance.

This bill passed the House of Representatives after quite a struggle and long debate and after quite an examination. It was referred to the Committee on Finance of the Senate. It will appear very strange and singular to the Senate when I state that as soon as this bill was referred to them, and I saw the importance of it, I went directly to the Senator from New York. I called his attention to the importance of the bill, the character of it, its provisions, and I asked him if he would name to me persons in the city of New York who could give me the other view of this case. The bill had been pressed by a committee of merchants, by eminent men, great numbers of them, and by their testimony pressed with great force and great interest, and they claimed to represent the whole mercantile body of New York.

As a matter of course, I could not know whether that statement was true or not. I inquired of the Senator from New York, and he was kind enough to name to me certain merchants eminently distinguished who would probably give me the other side of the case, or at least give me a fair and impartial view of the subject, because it was a very important bill, and we wished to guard the revenues. The result was that I did write to the gentlemen whose names the Senator from New York was kind enough to give me, and I got their reply. I say to him, and I say now to the Senate, those replies influenced some of the very sections that are now criticised in this debate, and the chief one.

Let me go a little further. When this bill was taken up by the committee and considered, many of the details of the bill related to the regulations of the custom-house, of which the Committee on Finance have no more special knowledge than other committees. Such questions usually go to the Committee on Commerce, and I would have much preferred that the formal sections of this bill in regard to the mode and manner of importing goods should go to the committee which properly has charge of such matters; but they were in the bill connected with other matters and we had to consider them.

But to prevent ourselves from being misled for the want of detailed information as to the practical workings of this bill we sent it to the Secretary of the Treasury with our proposed amendments, calling particular attention to the importance of the bill, calling for statements to be made upon the basis of the bill, what effect it would have, what changes of the existing law it would make. I have before me a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating the only defects in the bill to which he deemed it necessary to call our attention. We sent him the amendments we had made, and some of those he criticised, and we again reported the bill with the amendments suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury and with the criticisms he made properly acted upon. That shows that we have examined this bill with great care, more care than we would usually bestow upon an ordinary bill, because we felt the importance of it, and did not wish in the least to diminish the revenue.

Now a word in regard to the twelfth section. The great body of criticism on the bill is upon the twelfth section. My friend from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] went off about that. He thought that by this twelfth section we utterly destroyed and broke down the present law. The present law imposes a penalty of $5,000. This bill is much more carefully guarded; it is much broader in its scope. It includes a great many offenses not included in the law the Senator from Nevada showed me. I have not been able to find the original law in the code he furnished me. He furnished me the new code, which does not refer to the old law, and I could not find it in the Statutes at Large; but on comparing the two this section is far better in every respect, more clear in its definitions, more copious, including many more cases, and therefore in that respect better. It is true it omits the penitentiary clause, and that is the clause that has been complained of.

One of the great causes of complaint by the merchants was that they might be involved in a criminal prosecution for a penitentiary offense for the mere neglect or failure of agents, consignees, or owners, because, as was very clear to the Senate from the reading of the statutes read by the Senator from Vermont, to which I called his attention, the mere neglect or omission or fraudulent conduct of an agent at home or abroad in making out an invoice, which is sworn to in the ordinary course in the custom-house, might involve honest and honorable men in a criminal prosecution and most grievous penalties.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will excuse me, he does not mean to say that any statute that he or I read has the slightest reference to a criminal prosecution against a person. They all related to the forfeiture of goods.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I say under the law a man swearing to an affidavit and really believing that the invoice to which the affidavit was attached was a fair and honest invoice might be involved in prosecutions. I did not say that he could be convicted unless they proved guilty intent upon him; but his goods might be forfeited although he was entirely innocent of offense. His goods the Government of the United States would seize upon. They hold them in custody. They do not stop to prove the guilty intention of the importer. It is the guilty intention of the invoice or thing that was made in Europe, the guilty intention of the act of producing and passing the goods through the custom-house; and the goods of the merchant might be absolutely forfeited and the whole invoice might be forfeited for the fault or the wrong or the crime of others. It was that grievance that the merchant complained of.

Now, in regard to this twelfth section, the purpose of the section is simply to do what Mr. Stewart advised us to do; that is, to make the forfeiture, instead of applying to the whole invoice, apply to the particular item; and I think following the advice of Mr. Stewart in that particular we have committed an error. I think that forfeiture ought to extend further, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] has already made a motion which I shall vote for with great pleasure to extend it; but you will see that the recommendation of Mr. Stewart upon which we acted was the very recommendation that induced us to change the forfeiture from the package or invoice in certain cases to the item, because that he recommends.

Then, besides that, he recommends a penalty to the amount of three times the value of the article tainted with fraud. Upon examination we found that would not do at all. The article imported might only amount to $10, which is the ordinary case of smuggling of a lot of whisky or brandy along the border, where the importation ought to be punished heavily although the amount involved is very small. Therefore the penalty could not depend on the value of the article imported. It must depend on other circumstances. Take the case, and they are by the thousand along the border, where the value of the property imported is only from $10 to $100. I suppose the Senator from Michigan will tell you that the ordinary value of smuggled goods in a single package on the border is rarely over $100. I said a while ago $1,000. Therefore as these importations come slipping in in the by-ways, through small boats, and in various ways, and in many cases amount to but $10 or $20, it would not do to take Mr. Stewart's rule and only impose a fine of three times the value of the goods. So we had to fix a specific sum. Besides, the old law fixed a specific sum.

But the Senator says that under the law as we propose it here Phelps, Dodge & Co. would only have to pay $5,000 for all their offenses. Why, sir, Phelps, Dodge & Co. would have to pay two and a half million dollars under the operation of this bill. My friend from New York certainly could not have read the copious language of this section. Let me read it to him again. In the statement furnished by the honorable Senator from Vermont, which I have before me, there are about one hundred invoices running through one year; but the invoices upon which all these enormous penalties were levied on Phelps, Dodge & Co. ran through a period of five years.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I do it with great deference. That is another error. The invoices from which these items were taken were all within fifteen months, and these other five years of invoices had nothing to do with it. I have heard that statement made repeatedly. I now deny it once for all and appeal to the record.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the account here. There can be no controversy between the Senator from New York and myself about this matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They run from the 28th of January, 1871, to the 16th of March, 1872.

Mr. CONKLING. That is all there is of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the paper I have before me the first date is January 28, 1871, and the last one is March 16, 1872.

Mr. CONKLING. That is fifteen months.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now let us suppose that the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co. had gone before a court. Let me first read the section upon which the comment is made, and see if this penalty is inefficient:

> That any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make, or attempt to make, any entry of imported merchandise, by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or who shall be guilty of any willful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by such act or omission, shall severally forfeit and pay a fine of not more than $5,000 for each offense.

For each offense Phelps, Dodge & Co. might be fined $5,000. Now take the case of these invoices. There is but one that amounts to £2,500. That amounts to $12,500, about two and a half times the amount of the fine. The property, as a matter of course, would be forfeited under this bill. In that particular case there would first be a confiscation of the property and then a fine less than the value of the property; but, sir, in nearly every other case the fine of $5,000 is more than four times the value of the property; and therefore, in the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co., taking each invoice and each importation separately as a distinct act, the fine at the rate of $5,000 upon each invoice or each importation would amount to over $2,000,000. The whole value of the property tainted, according to the figures the Senator gave me, and no doubt correctly, was $271,000.

According to the best estimate I can make on this table the value of each importation is a little less than $1,000; I should say considerably less. There is only one amounting to £2,500; another to about £1,000. There are only two over £1,000. The most of them are for £50, £60, and £300. Each is a separate and distinct importation, and each is a separate and distinct offense. Under this section the United States could have sued Phelps, Dodge & Co. for a fine of $5,000 for each offense upon each box, certainly upon each invoice, and they could have joined them in a joint or several action or bring an action in the name of the United States and recover in that action for all these fines.

It is manifest from this statement that in this strong case presented by the Senator from New York the fine imposed by us by this bill, $5,000 for each offense, is far greater than three times the value of the property; and that is all I said. I say again now that ordinarily the value of the property tainted, as the Senator uses that term and it is a very proper one, in a single importation would probably rarely exceed $1,000.

Now, sir, what I complain of of the Senator from New York, and I appeal now to his sober judgment, is this: if he considered the bill defective in this way; if instead of a fine of a gross sum, leaving it to the discretion of the court to go below that if it saw proper, he had said to me that the fine ought to be larger, that $5,000 was not sufficient, or if he had said that the fine ought to depend on the value of the property and should be three or four times as great as the property; if he had criticised it in this way, I would have given him the reasons why we preferred to stand by the original fine; and at the very beginning of this discussion I invited the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] and the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] to move amendments to this bill; and yet the Senator from New York has moved no amendments. It is just as much his duty, and more, than it is mine, to move amendments to this bill; and I should at any time have yielded to them unless I could give some very strong reasons to the contrary; but that he has not done. He has not offered amendments. He tells us he is going to vote for the bill. So say I. So we shall not differ in the end.

I have felt it my duty as a member of this body in no way connected with the interests directly affected, living in a Western State, to examine this bill carefully and see first that it did not sacrifice the revenue, and next that it did not do injustice to importers; and seizing upon every amendment that occurred to me that would relieve merchants from oppression and protect the revenue, we have done it.

The section about examining books and papers was proposed at the suggestion of Mr. Stewart. True we have not adopted his phraseology. He simply says suitable measure should be devised by which books and papers could be seized. We have done it. They all recommended that; even Mr. Schultz who opposed the amendment originally, and who appeared here the earnest advocate of this bill, the chairman of the committee of merchants of New York to urge this bill, acquiesced in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance.

The Senator from New York also calls attention to the fourteenth section. I have read it. I think it is exactly right. One of the complaints of the merchants was that if there was any variation in the statement of the cost or expense of transporting the goods from the place of manufacture to the place of shipment, no matter how slight, it was made the pretext for a seizure. We levy duties not only on the cost of the article at the place of manufacture, but upon the cost of transporting it from there to the place of shipment, the boxes, packages, &c.; and many of the chief controversies have arisen out of the differences of opinion as to the cost of transportation; and whenever the invoice is not in the opinion of the custom-house officers correct as to these items a controversy at once arises and the goods may be seized because perchance the merchant may not render a correct account, or what the custom-house officer may claim to be a correct account, of the cost and expense of transporting them from the place of manufacture to the place of delivery. Therefore it was that these elements of the duties were segregated, separated from the cost of the article itself, which might be ascertained and measured by actual measurement, by actual inspection, by actual appraisement; and then this fourteenth section requires—

> That wherever any statute requires that, to the cost or market-value of any goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, there shall be added to the invoice thereof, or, upon the entry of such goods, wares, and merchandise, charges for inland transportation, commissions, port duties, expenses of shipping, export duties, cost of packages, boxes, or other articles containing such goods, wares, and merchandise, or any other incidental expenses attending the packing, &c., the omission shall not be a cause of forfeiture, but it is added to the invoice. If, then, the merchant fraudulently or erroneously undervalues these expenses or states them at less than what they are, and the customs officers establish the fact, they can levy twice the amount of the duties. In other words, they put on a penalty of 100 per cent. It is manifest that the section is a better section to guard against abuses on the revenue in estimating the cost of packages instead of forfeiting the goods. Having the goods in your possession, if you believe the merchant has failed to render a just account of the articles, you double the cost, adding a penalty of 100 per cent. Is not that severe enough? Would you, because there was a difference between the merchant and the custom-house officer as to this incidental cost of transportation and of packages, confiscate the whole invoice or allow the seizure of the goods? Merely on account of a difference of opinion, or even in case of actual fraud or undervaluation of these expenses, would you allow a confiscation of the goods? On the other hand, the committee have provided a wise remedy for that case. That is another section to which the Senator referred.

Again, he referred to section 4. When the section was gone over before, the Senator from New York criticised it somewhat, called our attention to the definition. I answered at once that this section does not change the law against smuggling; it does not change the penalty for smuggling, and I asked the Senator from New York to suggest some amendment and that definition, if it was not right, according to my recollection. I asked for any amendment to this definition of smuggling, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] responded to that appeal and offered an amendment which I readily acquiesced in, and it was his amendment striking out a certain portion of that section, which we agreed to, that to some extent creates the embarrassment on which the Senator from New York now comments. If the Senator from New York thought our definition of smuggling was wrong, as he was representing a State of an almost boundless border along the lakes and on the ocean, why could he not aid the Committee on Finance a little by giving us a proper definition? We would have accepted it with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my friend allow me to interpose a moment there?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I say from deliberation, for I have looked at that, I have to-day referred to but one single objection to this bill which I did not point out when the section was read to which it belonged, and I suggested to eight different sections of the bill, which I have now marked before me, amendments which I thought ought to be made, saying that I did not wish to interfere or be deemed in hostility to the act, but that I ventured to point out for the better consideration in form of the committee these objections. Here they are now marked on the margin of my bill, and I give the Senator my word that I have spoken to-day of but one single thing to which I did not draw the attention of the committee either in his presence or absence, when the sections were read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Anybody can make suggestions of amendments, but the Senator from New York has the right and it is his duty to offer the amendments which he thinks right to the Senate. If he had offered amendments in the details of the bill and said that he believed they were proper, we should have considered them. As a matter of course a mere suggestion to a Senator having charge of a bill of an amendment does not either impose on him the duty to accept it, nor ought he to do it. I represent here the Committee on Finance. What right have I to be offering amendments while I am acting as the organ of that committee, unless I am authorized by the committee? I do not do it. Any Senator can do it; the Senator from New York can do it; and I have no doubt if he proposed amendments to the bill such as it occurred to his experience would make the bill better, they would have been received and no doubt adopted. I certainly should not be standing here to oppose them.

The amendment pending is the proposition of the Senator from Nevada to strike out the twelfth section. As I have shown you, we have put on the twelfth section and especially the last clause of it at the suggestion of those who thought the bill insufficient, Mr. Stewart himself suggesting that the confiscation should be confined to the item of merchandise undervalued. If that is not sufficient enlarge it.

If the section changes the law too much, if you still want to keep up the idea of the penitentiary against all your merchants, and keep the old penal clause of two years' imprisonment in the penitentiary to compel them to do their duty when you have the custody of their goods and the power to examine them and take them all to pieces if you choose, be it so. You require these merchants to give security for the honesty of your agents. All these goods pass through the custom-house; they are all in the custody of the Government; but the old law seemed to require the officers to give security that the officers of the United States, paid by the United States, would not cheat the United States. If that is the purpose, and you desire to maintain the penal clause of that act in regard to offenses against the revenue laws, insert it; I have no objection. What I complain of is that on a bill of this kind in which I have not the slightest feeling we should be kept here three days and no amendment proposed that has not been readily assented to.

I trust now, Mr. President, that after this long and wearisome debate we shall have a close of this matter and get it out of the way. After a careful and conscientious examination of this bill, aided by many merchants interested in foreign trade, aided also by custom-house officers whose testimony is on record pro and con here on this subject, aided by private communication with merchants for and against this bill, aided by the Treasury Department, aided by mutual consideration in committee, the Committee on Finance reported this bill unanimously, every amendment having been fairly and fully considered. It does seem to me it has met with unusual opposition. I hope that now since the matter has gone so far it will be closed, and that we may go home Let the bill be passed or rejected according to the sense of the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. I am not going to delay a vote on this bill any great length of time, but as I suspect I am going to be about alone in voting against the passage of the bill, I want to assign two or three reasons why I do so.

I heard the Senator from Ohio just now intimate, as I thought, that this bill was framed in the interest of the revenue, that it was calculated to secure a more complete collection of the revenues than we have under the existing law. If I believed such would be the operation of the bill, I should certainly vote for it. I do not believe that will be the operation of this law, and I am obliged to confess that I do not think it was the intent of the law. On that point I must have been mistaken.

Mr. President, I hear on all sides of me the opinion avowed that moieties ought to be abolished utterly. I may be alone in the Senate upon this point, but my deliberate conviction is that moieties ought not to be abolished, that you cannot with safety to the revenue abolish them. I have once expressed the opinion; I joined with the Committee on Retrenchment and Reform in the expression of the opinion some two years since that customs officers ought not to share in moieties. As the passage is short, I want to reproduce what that committee said on that occasion. The committee said:

> Moieties should not be allowed to officers of the customs, except in the case of smuggled goods seized. It is the duty of these officers to assess and collect the duties on imports. It is their business not to permit any frauds upon the revenue. Attempts will be made to introduce merchandise upon our markets without payment of duty at all. Whoever defeats an attempt at smuggling should be allowed at least one-half the net proceeds of the goods condemned. But when goods are entered at the custom-house there should be no cheating in quantities or values. It is the duty of the officers of the customs to prevent that. Their salaries should be adequate to all the labor they perform and all the responsibility they assume. Still, in spite of diligence and fidelity, they will be sometimes circumvented. But the Government should not bribe them to be defrauded by holding up to them great fortunes for detecting the fraud.
> The husbandman who pays his harvester a meager salary for gathering grain, but offers him one-half for gleaning all that his own rake passes over, should not be surprised to know that his servant rakes slovenly. If in spite of all the vigilance and fidelity that can be secured in the custom-house frauds are perpetrated, other agents of the Government should be stimulated to ferret them out and expose them, and if they do not always uncover their heads while investigating such alleged frauds, as it is complained some of the special agents of the Treasury do not, it is probably better to tolerate even that outrage upon good manners rather than allow the frauds to go on unpunished.

To that opinion of the committee I subscribe. I stand by it still. I think customs officers should not be allowed to share in moieties; but when, in spite of the officers of the customs, goods have been fraudulently introduced into the country, and by non-payment of duty or by underpayment of duty have been put upon the market in fraud of the revenues and in fraud of honest dealing, then whoever detects that fraud, uncovers that wrong, recovers those duties, I think should be amply paid for doing so. To give them one-half of the amount they recover is not a loss to the Treasury. If they make large sums by doing so, the Treasury makes just as much.

I heard the Senator from Ohio say yesterday, I thought with a sort of shudder, that the amount of moieties recovered by our special agents within a certain period—I do not know that he specified how long—amounted to about $2,000,000. What does that prove? It means that frauds to the amount of $4,000,000 have been perpetrated upon the Treasury. They recovered the $4,000,000, and one-half went into the Treasury and they got the other half, and but for the offer of that one-half the Treasury would have been $2,000,000 poorer than it is. I do not feel encouraged, therefore, to dispense with an agency which without wronging the country at all earns so much. I think it is a very singular lesson to draw from that fact that those agents should all be mustered out of our service. It seems to me inevitable that but for this very system you would have been just so much poorer. And so, Mr. President, I am opposed to this repeal of the moiety system, so called. Enough of that.

I think this change proposed in the law directing or regulating the seizure of books and papers is a mistaken and a mischievous one. This bill proposes that the Government shall wait, before it calls upon a merchant to show his books, until there has been a prima facie case of fraud made out, a suit commenced upon it, the specific fraud pointed out in the proceedings, and when the guilty party knows precisely what you are aiming at and knows precisely the book and the paper in his possession which will furnish conclusive evidence of it, then you go into court and upon notice move the court for an order to seize that book or that paper. Well, suppose the court grants the motion, do you think the marshal will find the book or the paper? Never, never. The merchant who has no more conscience than to perpetrate the fraud will have no conscience to prevent his laying out of sight and beyond the reach of human eyes the evidence which proves the fraud. The Government is required by this bill to give him special notice and ample time in which to do it. The seizure of books and papers is the idlest ceremony in the world under such regulations as those.

The Senator from Indiana this afternoon read to you what H. B. Claflin, a merchant of New York, said upon this very subject. H. B. Claflin needs no introduction to the Senate or to the people of the United States. He is willing to pay duties, but he wants that his rivals in business should pay duties. His books are open to the inspection of the Government of the United States, and there is no honest man trading in New York or elsewhere who will not open his books to the inspection of the Government of the United States on invitation to do it. Honest men, honest merchants, do not ask for any such security against visitation as this bill provides.

Now, Mr. President, I want to make one remark upon two other sections of this bill. The Senator from Ohio takes issue with the Senator from New York upon the point as to whether the penalties provided in this eleventh section are greater or less than the penalty now provided by law for the same class of frauds. I did not enter into that dispute. What I have to say to the Senator from New York is this: You exclude the Government from the inspection of the merchant's books; you take from all men every inducement to ferret out fraud, and you never will enforce the penalty.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend will allow me to say that the committee reported a carefully prepared section intended to cover that case, and it was voted down and I think the Senator voted against the section. I understand the Senator to be complaining that we have repealed the section allowing an examination of books and papers.

Mr. HOWE. I was speaking of the provision which the Senator had reported in this bill for the seizure of books and papers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg pardon.

Mr. HOWE. I say you exclude the Government from a view of the merchant's books, and you take from your special agents of the Treasury all inducement to ferret out frauds and you never will enforce one of these penalties. Frauds are as safe as any kind of transaction in the world. An undervaluation, unless it is gross, palpable, manifest to the appraiser, stands no more danger of rebuke under the operation of this bill than the discount of a note of hand, for a double reason; first, because the whole tenor of this debate from the first word I have heard dropped in it down to the present time has been to inculcate the notion that it was infamous, not to cheat, but to tell the cheat.

In lieu of offering to the special agent one-half of what he may recover from these frauds, you propose to appropriate $100,000 and have it doled out by the judge or the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the principle of a quantum meruit in each case. You first establish it as a prime article in the morality of the country that it is infamous to detect a fraud, and then you tell the man, "If you will incur this infamy we will allow the judge and the Secretary of the Treasury to pay you as much as it is worth for doing it." I shall not go into the business of informer, I shall refuse to take the office of special agent, under the provisions of this bill.

Another point. The Senator from Ohio speaks rather feelingly of the embarrassments merchants labor under in fixing the cost of transporting from the place of manufacture to the place of shipment. They are liable to all sorts of mistakes; it is very hard for the Government to take advantage of them. Well, it is very hard for the Government to take an advantage of a mistake at any time under any circumstances, but I do not understand that by the law as it exists to-day any importer has ever suffered seriously as a consequence of mere mistake. If that is the case I will go as far as he who will go farthest to guard against such injuries hereafter.

But what is this provision? This bill says that if the merchant does not add to his invoice the cost of transportation from the place of manufacture to the place of shipment, the collector shall add what he deems to be that cost, and by way of penalty upon him, says the Senator from Ohio, he shall double it. What is the practical operation of that? If a merchant presents his invoice containing just the price paid the manufacturer for his goods with nothing added for transportation, the collector sees that here is a clear case of omission, and in that case, which is not very likely to happen, the bill says to the collector "You must do something, and you must add twice as much as you think the cost of transportation may have been," not a serious penalty in that case. But suppose that case does not occur but the merchant does add something for the cost of transportation but does not add the true cost, what will the collector do then? As soon as he is satisfied that that is not the true cost he has nothing to do but collect the duties upon just that sum which the merchant puts into his invoice. That is all, and I should like to have the Senator from Ohio tell me or any sensible man to tell me if he believes any collector of customs, from the time this bill becomes a law until the time it shall be wiped from the statute-book, will ever dare to add one dollar to an invoice for the cost of transportation.

He will be a bolder collector of the customs than I have ever known employed in your service, a bolder one much, I believe, than you are very likely to secure in the customs service, who dares to confront the mercantile community of any one of your great cities by telling them "Sir, this is not enough that you have put into this invoice." He must have evidence before he dares to say that; and how is he going to get that evidence? What is going to compensate him for getting the evidence? When and how is he going to ascertain whether the cost of transportation from Lyons to Havre or to Brest be one sum or another? It is about the last inquiry that a collector of customs will enter upon under the operations of this bill.

Mr. President, I promised not to detain the Senate long. These are some of the considerations which have led me to believe, as I do believe with my whole soul, that this bill if enacted into a law, as it must be evidently, will prove disastrous to your revenues. I will acknowledge when it has been in operation a year my great mistake, and will acknowledge it most cheerfully, if the returns from your Treasury do not show a very startling diminution of your duties.

[Mr. CARPENTER addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. STEVENSON. When I asked the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] the question whether he supposed, as he seemed to be under the impression was the fact, that this bill was a mine sprung for some secret or political purpose, I only desired to remind him of the fact that for six years this system of moieties has been complained of as ill-judged and injurious and fraudulent. I asked him if Secretary McCulloch had not done so, and I named him because he was the first Secretary of the Treasury who called the attention of the country to the injurious operation of this system of moieties. He said he had never heard of it. I was not in the Senate then, nor was he; but I will show the Senator that not only Mr. McCulloch, but every Secretary since, has done the same thing. Mr. McCulloch, in his annual report for the year 1869, said:

> The reason on which the laws granting such allowances are based is that officers of the Government are stimulated to greater activity in the discovery of frauds, and in bringing offenders to punishment. There can be no doubt that such is the effect of the policy, but the experience I have had in the Treasury Department has convinced me that the evils attending the system are greater than the benefits derived from it. It often occurs that revenue officers are led to assert claims, in behalf of the Government, which have no just foundation in law or in the facts of the respective cases; and, where real claims exist, it is often the object of the informers and officers, who share in the penalties, to misrepresent the case to the Department, so as to secure the greatest advantage to themselves. But a more serious evil is found in the practice, quite general, of allowing persons to pursue a fraudulent course until a result is reached which will inure to the benefit of the officers and informers, instead of checking criminal practices at the outset.

He recommended that that system should be abolished. His successor, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] made two recommendations to the same effect and himself prepared a bill to get rid of the system. What did Mr. BOUTWELL say when he was Secretary of the Treasury? In his report for the year 1871 he said:

> It is my duty to call the attention of Congress to the importance of abolishing the system of shares and moieties as far as the benefits inure to revenue officers and other persons officially connected with the Government. * * * In most of the cases the officers do not perform special services entitling them to the amounts granted, and importers and others, whose acts are made the subject of investigation, complain, and I think with just reason, that the agents of the Government have a pecuniary interest in pursuing those charged with violations of the law. * * * One of the difficulties which the Department has to meet frequently is that the customs officers have an interest in the proceedings for the discovery of fraud, the settlement of cases, or in the prosecution of them, which is different from the real interest of the Government, and, as a necessary result, the conduct of such officers is open to suspicion, both on the part of those who are pursued by them and the Government they ostensibly represent.

Still later, when these outrages or irregularities were committed, after these two recommendations by the Secretary of the Treasury, a committee from the Senate went on to New York to investigate these alleged outrages. If I remember aright a reference to the report of that committee, of which the Senator from Wisconsin nearest me [Mr. HOWE] was a member, and of which I believe the venerable Senator whose seat he now occupies, the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM,] was chairman, will show that although there was a majority and a minority report, the committee recommended that the system of moieties should be abolished.

Mr. HOWE. I read just now to the Senate what was the recommendation of the majority of the committee. I do not remember what was the recommendation of the minority. The recommendation of the majority was that the moieties should be repealed so far as officers of the customs service are concerned, but not beyond that.

Mr. STEVENSON. So that the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin farthest from me [Mr. CARPENTER] will see that this subject has been one in which, irrespective of party, men of distinction who have ably executed the duties of Secretary of the Treasury have long since perceived that there was a difficulty not only in the execution of this system of moieties, but that it led to corruption and was attended with the worst and most injurious effects.

When I rose it was only to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] who does not seem to remember that the Secretary of the Treasury had ever recommended it, and he asked me with an air of assurance whether a bill had ever been prepared. I tell him that two bills were prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] an extract from whose report I have read. So if my friend thinks this is a new scheme for the first time brought before the country he is mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOREMAN in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] to strike out section [10] 12 of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the vote is taken, I call attention to the fact that an amendment is pending to perfect the text, to strike out "item" and insert "package."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The only motion the Chair has heard is the motion to strike out the section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought the alteration was proposed to strike out "item" and insert "package."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was not a motion; it was simply a conversation among Senators.

Mr. THURMAN. It can be moved now before the vote is taken on striking out.

Mr. SHERMAN. We can move it afterward just as well. We may as well vote now on striking out.

Mr. BAYARD. Before the vote is taken, I desire to state on behalf of my colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] that he is paired on this question with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.] If they were here my colleague would vote against this amendment, and the Senator from Indiana for it. I would also state that I am requested by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to say that by reason of his colleague's [Mr. EDMUNDS'S] sickness he has paired with him. If he were here, he would vote against the amendment and his colleague for it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boreman, Chandler, Conkling, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Pease, Ramsey, Sargent, and Stewart—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Johnston, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Oglesby, Ransom, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, and Wright—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pratt, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, West, and Windom—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SARGENT. I rise to offer an amendment to the section just under consideration. I move to strike out all after the word "shall" in line 11, down to and including the word "States" in line 15, and to insert in lieu of the words stricken out:

Be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000 nor less than fifty dollars for each offense, or be imprisoned therefor for any time not exceeding two years, or both.

This simply restores the old law in this respect. It does not soften the penalty as the section of the bill does. By the apparent action of the Senate we are to remove some of the means heretofore used for detection; in other words, perhaps to make detection more difficult. That may be wise or otherwise. But after detection shall be made more difficult, if it occurs I would not lessen the consequences of detection. If there is fraud against the United States—and we are dealing with cases of fraud—fraud that is worthy of a fine of $5,000, certainly is worthy of some imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

This is the law now, and it seems to me there ought not to be any objection to it. We certainly desire, the Senate must desire to punish men who are guilty of fraud on the revenue, and in a great many cases there will be no punishment if it is by means of a civil action, and that is what I strike out. I strike out the clause providing that the judgment may be $5,000. The parties may be entirely irresponsible. I desire that it shall be a criminal prosecution as it has been for eighty years past, and that it shall be followed by imprisonment in case of fraud. Let us at any rate protect the revenue in this respect.

Mr. SHERMAN. One criticism. The words "for each offense" may make trouble.

Mr. SARGENT. I put in the word "therefor," which is a change of the old law. The word "therefor" relates back to the words "each offense;" "shall be fined for each offense not exceeding $5,000, nor less than fifty dollars, and imprisonment therefor"—that is, for each offense.

Mr. SHERMAN. The words "for each offense" should either follow or precede the $5,000.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to that. That will make it clear, and then you may strike out the word "therefor."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment as modified reads:

Be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000 nor less than fifty dollars for each offense, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is hardly as it ought to be.

Mr. BAYARD. Would it not be well to insert "on conviction thereof?"

Mr. SARGENT. "On conviction thereof" might be proper enough, but I think I have taken the language of the codified statutes. It now reads, "shall for each offense be fined."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported as now modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

For each offense be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000, nor less than fifty dollars, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or both.

Several SENATORS. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think an amendment which I suggested meets the approbation of the Senator who has the bill in charge, and I shall move to amend the bill, but I will change the phraseology I before suggested a little, by adding after the word "to," in section 12, line 19, these words, "the whole of the merchandise in the case or package containing;" so that the clause will read:

Which forfeiture shall apply only to the whole of the merchandise in the case or package containing the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged frauds relate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that is well enough.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now I think the word "item" should be stricken out and the word "article" inserted. "Article of merchandise" is a better term. That word "item" referred as it stood to the particular clause in the invoice. It should now read "article of merchandise." I move that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. It ought to be "articles."

Mr. HAMLIN. Well, I will say "article or articles."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yesterday I believe the fifth section of the bill as reported by the committee the Senate refused to concur in. It occurred to me at that time that the vote was taken with not a fair understanding of the proposition contained in the amendment. I therefore offer it as an amendment to the bill, to follow the fourth section, a little changed in phraseology.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator to say that this amendment was disagreed to in the Senate?

Mr. WRIGHT. No, sir; in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert after section 4 the following:

SEC. 5. That in all suits and proceedings other than criminal arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States, the attorney representing the Government, whenever, in his belief, any business-book, invoice, or paper, belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant, will tend to prove any allegation made by the United States, may make a written motion, particularly describing such book, invoice, or paper, and setting forth the allegation which he expects to prove; and thereupon the court in which suit or proceeding is pending may, at its discretion, issue a notice to the defendant or claimant to produce such book, invoice, or paper in court at a day and hour to be specified in said notice, which, together with a copy of said motion, shall be served formally on the defendant or claimant by the United States marshal, by delivering to him a certified copy thereof or otherwise serving the same as original notices of suit in the same court are served; and if the defendant or claimant shall fail or refuse to produce such book, invoice, or paper in obedience to such notice, the allegations stated in the said motion shall be taken as confessed, unless his failure or refusal to produce the same shall be explained to the satisfaction of the court. And the said attorney shall be permitted to make examination of said book, invoice, or paper, if produced, and may offer the same in evidence on behalf of the United States. But the owner of said books and papers, his agent or attorney, shall have free access to them at all reasonable times pending their custody by the court.

Mr. STEWART. I simply wish to remark in regard to that, that it would not be harsh at all if you allowed the judge to decide on a proper showing by the district attorney of probable cause to get the books in the first instance. This is entirely useless as a means of redress, because if there is really fraud in the matter it will be impossible to obtain the books. There is no object in obtaining the books unless in the first instance before the party has time to put them away. The objection to the harsh operation of the old law was that an application was merely made on behalf of an interested person; but after a proper showing made by the district attorney to the judge, on the recommendation of the collector, that it is a case of smuggling, to enable them to have evidence, it is very proper to require the books to be produced. If you commence suit and give notice, then if a man has committed smuggling you will not get his books, because if he has committed smuggling it will be a much less offense than that he has already committed to throw his books in the fire or in the river or to conceal them where you will not get them.

There is not much virtue in this proposition; and it seems to me that the matter ought to be so arranged that upon a showing made by the district attorney to the district judge, on the application of the collector, an order might be made for the seizure of books. They could not make the showing unless they had a very strong case, and that would not annoy anybody, and we should be relieved from the trouble which the existing law has encountered but still would enable detection to be had in a bad case of smuggling.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not wish to say one word on this subject. It was discussed very fully yesterday. My purpose in offering the amendment now is to bring the question again before the Senate and get a vote upon it.

Mr. THURMAN. I believe there is no man more jealous than I am of anything like an inquisition into the private books or papers of any individual, and certainly no one who will resist more vigorously than I will to the best of his ability any attempt to compel a man accused of crime to produce evidence against himself. But if I understand the motion of the Senator from Iowa it is simply to amend the bill by inserting what was reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT. With the change of two words.

Mr. THURMAN. What are the changes?

Mr. WRIGHT. Adding the words "or refuse" in one line and "refusal" in another line; so as to make it so that the fact which is alleged by the district attorney shall be taken as true if the party refuses to produce the books as well as if he fails to produce the books.

Mr. THURMAN. This being restricted entirely to civil cases, this provision is precisely what has been the law of Ohio for more than fifty years. In civil cases you may serve a notice there, without any order of court, on the adversary party to produce books or papers material to the issue, and if he do not produce them our statute goes further and authorizes the court to compel their production, and if he will not produce them and there is a statement of what there is contained in them, then secondary evidence may be offered of their effect. This goes a little further than that, because it makes the assertion of the district attorney that the books do contain this statement, or that statement, or the other, evidence of that fact, if the books are not produced, or unless the want of their production is accounted for. I do not think that will work any hardship, and I do not think that violates the constitutional provision against unreasonable searches or seizures, or that it violates any right that anybody ought to insist upon. In other words, from time immemorial in aid of a court of law, a court of equity has been accustomed to compel the production of books and papers, and that is under certain limitations. Whether those limitations are here or not it is hardly necessary to state. For instance, a court of equity will not compel the production of papers that concern real estate if the production of those papers would tend to defeat the title of the person called upon to produce them. It will not compel the production of these papers if they would convict that person of a crime which would subject him to indictment, but where they subject him to no criminal punishment and where they do not defeat his title to real estate, a court of equity, for five hundred years almost I was going to say, for three hundred years has been accustomed to compel their production. Now courts of law do the same thing on motion, and in most of the States there is a provision by statute to that effect.

I would suggest, however, to the mover of the amendment that something by way of proviso that no one shall be compelled to produce any paper which would tend to convict him of any criminal offense, and then you have it precisely as the chancery law now is.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that that certainly is the rule without any provision here; it is left to the discretion of the court.

Mr. THURMAN. I think so.

Mr. BAYARD. When this subject was before the Senate the day before yesterday it was discussed and argued at some length, and the Senate by a vote taken by yeas and nays decided against retaining this section in the bill. As the bill came from the House it did not contain this section, and I have seen no reason to change my view that it is not necessary for all just purposes that the bill should contain the amendment now proposed.

Since 1789 there has been a general law, which is still in existence unrepealed, providing for the production of the books and papers of parties litigant in the United States courts in all cases where a court of chancery would compel their production, and providing for certain penalties in default of obedience to the order of the court. That has been the law since 1789, and it covers every reason which the Senator from Ohio has given for the adoption of the present amendment. Mr. President, why should the Government of the United States assume to stand in any other position in its own tribunals of justice than it adjudges private suitors to stand in relation to each other? If our laws are founded upon the principles of justice, the Government should be content to stand or fall by the same principles it allots in the decision of men's affairs. The Government ought not to be above its own law. The law should be the same for power and for weakness, for the Government and for the humblest culprit at its bar. We have a law which has been practiced under since the foundation of the Government, which has been copied into the statute-books of the various States, which is all-sufficient for the purpose of producing testimony when the justice of the case demands it, that testimony being in the possession of an opposing party and containing evidence pertinent to the issues joined between the parties. Now why should we have new legislation on this subject? If I thought we had no means of producing a book or paper in which the Government is interested I should be willing to have such a provision inserted in this bill; but there is no such necessity, because we already have ample legal provision for this end.

I hope that this amendment will not prevail. The Senate have signified their opinion of it after considerable debate which I am not now disposed to repeat, and by a direct vote on the yeas and nays. There is not a reason given by the Senator from Ohio in favor of this amendment which is not amply answered by the law of 1789.

Before the question is taken on the amendment, however, I propose to offer an amendment to it. I do not suppose when a book is ordered into court that it is ordered there for any other purpose than the inspection by the Government's attorney of the entry which is supposed to contain the testimony he wants; that the books of a merchant which are to be ordered into court are not to be opened and ransacked, and examined as to all other items under the pretext of looking for the one in regard to which the books have been called into court. I therefore propose to limit the examination of the books to the entry referred to in the notice. The notice requires the allegation to be made to be set forth, stating what the district attorney expects to prove, and that it shall tend to prove an allegation made by the Government in the pleadings of the cause. I propose in line 22, after the word "examination," to insert these words: "of the entries referred to in said notice, at which examination the defendant or claimant orj his agent may be present;" so that it will read:

And the said attorney shall be permitted to make examination of the entries referred to in said notice, at which examination the defendant or claimant or his agent may be present.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senator from Iowa will agree to that.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let the amendment be reported from the desk. I was engaged at the moment and did not hear it.

Mr. THURMAN. I only wish to say to my friend from Iowa that there is no use at all in the statement to be made by the district attorney and the notice to be given, unless the limitation suggested by the Senator from Delaware prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Delaware will be read.

The Chief Clerk read Mr. BAYARD'S amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire also to offer an amendment in the twenty-fifth line, to insert after the word "have" at the end of that line these words: "the custody of them except pending their examination in court as aforesaid;" so that the sentence will read:

But the owner of said books and papers, his agent or attorney, shall have the custody of them, except pending their examination in court as aforesaid.

The Senate will see that a great deal of the complaint which has arisen from the examination of the books and papers of merchants was not merely that they were examined for the purpose of finding out the entry which contained proof of the alleged fraud, but that while they were looking for that, they would make a fishing excursion into the books generally and see whether they could not find something else on which to base other and further charges. Now, in the first place, we confine the examination by the district attorney to these entries; but the custody of the books and papers should certainly be left in the hands of the person who owns them excepting for such time as the examination of the books was being conducted in court. That will prevent parties hostile to the claimant undertaking to rummage through his books and papers when out of his possession and during his absence for the purpose of discovering things unfavorable to him and perhaps ruinous to his business, or to be made the basis of some future prosecution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware to insert after the word "have" in the twenty-fifth line of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa the words "the custody of them except pending their examination in court as aforesaid."

Mr. BAYARD. The amendment also includes the striking out after the word "have" the words "free access to them at all reasonable times pending their custody by the court."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment?

Mr. WRIGHT. As I understand the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, it is to strike out all of the section after the word "have" in the twenty-fifth line and to insert the words he has suggested.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think there is this objection to it: There might be a case before the court where the court would be satisfied to let the owner of the books have the custody of them, and taking them away he might perhaps destroy the very evidence that is desired. I suggest to the Senator to so arrange it that it shall be subject to the order of the court.

Mr. BAYARD. They would be subject to the order of the court. If there is intended fraud, nothing would be more conclusive evidence of it than the erasure of the books. If they are brought into court and there is found to be an alteration of figures, it would be evidence conclusive before any jury to condemn the party. My object in giving the party defendant the custody of the books is that he may have them in court for the purpose of this examination by the district attorney, but that no one else shall have them, and that he shall be entitled to protect his own property in that way at all times except when they are under examination by order of the court. They are subject to the order of the court. My amendment is that the party shall have the custody of them except pending their examination in court, and of course they come into court under the order of the judge in pursuance of the previous language of the section. I think the object of the Senator from Iowa is reached by that. They are brought into court by order of the court, kept there by the court, and this amendment only provides that the party defendant shall have them except pending their examination in court.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am quite unwilling to consent to an amendment that shall give to the owner of the books the right, without any reference to the discretion of the court, to take those books away and have them under his exclusive control after they have once been produced. I do not want that done. The bill as it stands at present provides that the owner "shall have free access to them at all reasonable times pending their custody by the court." Now it is proposed to strike that out and to give the defendant the exclusive custody of the books after they shall have been produced and whether the examination has been concluded or not.

Mr. BAYARD. Where would the Senator insert the words "subject to the order of the court?"

Mr. THURMAN. They should be inserted after the word "have" in line 25.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware accept that as a modification of his amendment?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware whether this would not meet his views:

But the owner of said books and papers, his agent or attorney, shall have free access to them at all reasonable times pending their custody by the court, and may, subject to such order, have the exclusive custody of such books.

Mr. BAYARD. O, no; free access will not do. I give him the absolute custody of them subject to the order of the court. The language of my amendment is this: "but the owner of such books and papers, his agent or attorney, shall have the custody of them subject to the order of the court."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

The question being put, it was declared that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. O, no; let us have a division.

Mr. BAYARD. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays and ask for a division to see if there is a quorum.

The question being again put, there were on a division 16 ayes.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is manifest that we shall have to have the yeas and nays if the Senator from Delaware insists on a further count.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio demand the yeas and nays?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do unless the Senator from Delaware withdraws the call for a division.

Mr. BAYARD. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. He withdraws his objection, and I hope the vote will be taken again viva voce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time.

Mr. STEWART and Mr. FLANAGAN called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and they were ordered.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to make one remark. During the course of the debate, and before certain modifications were adopted, I stated that my intention was to vote against the bill. I am not entirely satisfied with the condition of the bill at the present time; but as some of the strongest objections that I had to it have been obviated, I shall vote for the bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 39, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Oglesby, Ramsey, Ransom, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, and Wright—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Flanagan, Howe, and Pease—3.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Ingalls, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pratt, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Sprague, Stewart, West, and Windom—31.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3670) to amend section 1 of the act of May 27, 1872, entitled "An act to provide for the abatement or repayment of taxes on distilled spirits in bond destroyed by casualty;" in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BENJAMIN W. REYNOLDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. PRATT a conferee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of Benjamin W. Reynolds, in place of Mr. ALCORN, excused.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. SARGENT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3572) to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TIPTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (S. No. 913) for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. CONOVER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2198) for the relief of the heirs of William C. Brashear, an officer of the Texas navy, reported it without amendment.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 2099) to declare the bridge across the Niagara River authorized by the act of Congress approved June 30, 1870, a post-route—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 3518) to amend the act entitled "An act to divide the State of Virginia into two judicial districts," approved February 3, 1871—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 3664) to change the name of the schooner Alba—to the Committee on Commerce.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Finance:

A bill (H. R. No. 3668) for the relief of Smith & Matthews, of Illinois;

A bill (H. R. No. 3539) to admit free of duty merchandise sunk for two years, and afterward recovered; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3670) to amend section 1 of the act of May 27, 1872, entitled "An act to provide for the abatement or repayment of taxes on distilled spirits in bond destroyed by casualty."

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at eight o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 10, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. V. L. CONRAD.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

E. J. BROOKS.

Mr. KILLINGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3665) authorizing the President to reinstate E. J. Brooks as a first assistant engineer in the Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. HURLBUT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, submitted a report in writing upon House bill No. 145; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

ANN CORNELIA LANMAN.

Mr. STARKWEATHER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3666) for the relief of Mrs. Ann Cornelia Lanman; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CONSTANT LA MARE.

Mr. SAWYER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3667) granting a pension to Constant La Mare; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. SENER. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 3518, to amend the act entitled "An act to divide the State of Virginia into two judicial districts," approved February 3, 1871, and that the same be considered in the House at this time.

The bill was read. It provides in the first section that the act entitled "An act to divide the State of Virginia into two judicial districts," approved February 3, 1871, be amended as follows:

That in addition to the terms of the district court of the United States for the district of Virginia, as now provided by law, there shall be held two terms of the district court for the said district at the city of Fredericksburgh, in said State and district, beginning on the second Monday in March and September, respectively, in each year.

The second section provides that in the discretion of the district judge of said district, one or more terms annually of said district court may be held at Drummondtown, in the county of Accomac, at such time and after such notice, not being less than ten days, as the judge of said district court may give; and said last-named terms of said court shall be held only for the trial of issues arising in the counties of Accomac and Northampton, in said State.

The third section provides that the judge of the district court for the eastern district of Virginia shall be, and he is thereby, authorized to appoint a deputy clerk of the district court to be held in Fredericksburgh, Virginia, who shall be a deputy of the clerk of the district court held at Richmond, Virginia, and whose duties shall be governed by the laws now in force, and whose office shall be kept in Fredericksburgh, at such place in said town as the said judge shall designate; and the clerk so appointed shall perform all the duties of clerk of the district court to be held in Fredericksburgh, and he shall be entitled to all fees and emoluments appertaining to said office.

The fourth section provides that the deputy clerk appointed as aforesaid shall keep the records and files of all cases thereafter brought within the subdivision thereinafter named, and certify the same in manner already provided for by law; and that the subdivision referred to over which the said court shall have jurisdiction shall contain the following counties of Virginia, namely: Lancaster, Northumberland, Richmond, Westmoreland, King George, Stafford, Essex, Middlesex, Spottsylvania, including the city of Fredericksburgh, Virginia; and that thereafter all process upon parties or in rem, residing or being in said counties, are to be made returnable to the said district court held in Fredericksburgh, or the clerk's office of said court so to be held in said city, as provided for by existing laws.

The fifth section provides that all acts or parts of acts which are not consistent with the act are thereby repealed; and the act shall be in force from and after its passage.

No objection was made; and the Committee of the Whole was accordingly discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the same was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SENER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House one hour from this time the Committee on Ways and Means is entitled to the floor for the consideration of their reports.

LANDS SOLD FOR DIRECT TAXES.

Mr. BECK, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with amendments, House bill No. 3628 for the relief of owners and purchasers of lands sold for direct taxes in the insurrectionary States, &c.

Mr. BECK. This bill contains an appropriation, and a single objection to its consideration in the House will of course compel it to be referred to the Committee of the Whole; and I have no doubt that objection will be made. I therefore ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole. I ask also that the reports and letters directed to the Committee on Ways and Means by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in regard to the law of 1872 and the proposed act be printed in the RECORD, so that when this bill shall come up either in Committee of the Whole or by suspension of the rules, or in any other form, the House can see the explanation of it which has been made to the committee. This bill was either drawn or approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and doubtless by the Treasury Department.

First, the report laid before the House by Mr. Kerr, of Indiana, in 1872, when the law was passed. Mr. Kerr said:

Mr. L. S. Emery, of the internal revenue office, has furnished to the committee, under the direction of his superior officer, a very instructive historical statement of the legislation and proceedings for the collection of direct taxes, from which I obtain the following facts:

By the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861, a United States direct tax of $20,000,000 per annum was apportioned, pro rata, to the then existing States, Territories, and District of Columbia.

The act itself fixed the amount of tax apportioned to each, and provided that each State, &c., might assume payment, and pay the same in its own way, by and through its own officers, but that notice should be given to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, on or before the second Tuesday of February next thereafter, of its intention to assume and to pay its quota, and that 15 per cent. should be deducted on the amounts actually paid into the United States Treasury on or before the last day of June in the year to which such payment related, and 10 per cent. on the amounts actually paid between that date and the last day of September in each year to which such payment related.

A subsequent act, approved May 13, 1862, provides for the deduction of 15 per cent. on claims presented to the United States Treasury Department, for the liquidation of said tax, on or before the 30th of July, 1862.

The act of August 5, 1861, makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to collect all or any part of this tax, in case any State, &c., fails to pay the same after giving notice of assumption, the same as though no such notice of assumption had been given.

Again it provides "that should any of the people of any of the States or Territories of the United States or the District of Columbia, be in actual rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States at the time this act goes into operation, so that the laws of the United States cannot be executed therein, it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized, to proceed to execute the provisions of this act within the limits of such State or Territory or District of Columbia, so soon as the authority of the United States therein is re-established, and to collect the sums which would have been due from the persons residing or holding property or stocks therein, with the interest due, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum thereon until paid, in the manner and under the regulations prescribed in the foregoing sections of this act."

Most of the Northern States and Territories formally assumed payment of their respective quotas and gave notice of their intention to pay the same. Some of them have liquidated the amounts charged against them in full, some only in part, while others have neglected to pay any part of their quota.

In consequence of some of the States being in insurrection, and a prospect of too long a delay of proceedings under the provisions of this act, Congress, by an act approved June 7, 1862, provided for the collection of this tax in the insurrectionary States by and through United States direct-tax commissioners.

In pursuance of the provisions of this new act commissioners were appointed for each of the eleven insurrectionary States, to assess and to collect this tax, which it was provided should be charged against the lands and collected from the owners thereof, with an addition of 50 per cent. penalty to the amount of tax charged against each tract or lot.

This tax, according to the original act, was to have been an annual tax, but Congress by an act approved July 1, 1862, limited the collection to one annual tax until April 1, 1865, and by an act approved June 30, 1864, limited it to one year, until further legislation.

While the tax commissioners, appointed under the act of June 7, 1862, were actively engaged in making assessments and collecting this tax, and had already collected about one-half of the total amount apportioned to these eleven States, Congress, by an act approved July 28, 1866, authorized the suspension of further collection in these States until January 1, 1868, and collections were forthwith suspended by order of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The time specified in the act expired, but the collections were not resumed; meanwhile most of the commissioners had been relieved from duty.

Again, Congress by an act approved July 23, 1868, provided for the further suspension of the collection of this tax in these States until January 1, 1869; since which no action has been taken by Congress further suspending said collections, nor have collections been resumed in any of these States.

In pursuance of the provisions of the act of June 7, 1862, the tax commissioners seized a large quantity of lands in some of the States and sold the same for non-payment of the taxes charged against them; considerable of this land was bid in by the commissioners for the United States, and has never been redeemed, to which I will hereinafter refer more specifically.

The following table will show the amount apportioned to each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia, the deduction of 15 per cent., the amount due after deducting the 15 per cent., the amount paid into the Treasury direct, the amount satisfied by the allowance of claims presented, and the amount now due, as appears by the records of this office:

*Not in last year's report.

In Tennessee the lands have been very much improved, and I am informed that the present valuation of the lands owned by the United States under the direct-tax law in that State will exceed $1,000,000.

For several years after the suspension of the collection of these taxes, the lands which had been bid in for and still owned by the United States seemed to be lost sight of, except in South Carolina, where the commissioners were retained until October 31, 1870. The result is that parties took possession, assumed ownership, and conveyed formal titles, and parties now in possession, when notified to surrender possession to the United States, allege that they were innocent purchasers, ignorant of the fact that the United States had any title to the lands whatsoever.

In many cases these alleged innocent purchasers have made extensive improvements on the lands by building houses, &c., thereon, making these places their homes.

I refer to this as an additional reason for some immediate action in relation to these lands whereby further complication and difficulties in obtaining possession may be avoided.

The propriety of arranging the data relative to the late insurrectionary States is obvious from the fact that an entirely different method of collections was adopted whereby the amounts collected were charged against separate tracts or lots of land in the several States, and the amounts uncollected are charged against the tracts or lots of land upon which the tax has not been paid.

Again, the amount of tax, &c., collected, and the amount due from these States, is given with approximate accuracy.

Sales of lands for non-payment of the taxes charged against them were made by the commissioners, from which the following approximate amounts, as proceeds thereof, have been received:

Virginia, proceeds of sales amounting to	$113,130 57
South Carolina, proceeds of sales amounting to	370,000 00
Florida, proceeds of sales amounting to	64,705 87
Arkansas, proceeds of sales amounting to	48,067 24
Tennessee, proceeds of sales amounting to	101,970 52

Lands were bid in by the commissioners at these sales for the United States, still unredeemed, with the following valuations:

In Virginia:
By the assessment of 1860, valued at	$75,000
In South Carolina:
By estimates of the late commissioners	300,000
In Florida:
By the assessment of 1860	25,000
In Tennessee:
By the assessment of 1860	309,000
Making a total of	$709,000

In South Carolina there was a large quantity of land bought in by the United States which has been resold under what is known as "Army and Navy," "head of family," and school-fund sales. Under the Army and Navy sales, one-fourth was paid down, and the remainder was to be paid in three years. About $160,000 of these deferred payments remain unsatisfied, and the time has expired when the whole amount should have been paid. (See section 11, act of Congress approved June 7, 1862.)

President Lincoln, in his instructions to the South Carolina commissioners, dated September 16, 1863, directed that in case the purchaser failed to pay the residue within the limited time, it was lawful for the said commissioners to enter upon these lands and sell the same for the payment of the purchase-money due the United States, returning the overplus, if any, to the purchaser, his heirs or assigns.

These instructions are specified in the certificates of sale issued to this class of purchasers.

The commissioners did not sell these lands at the expiration of the limited time, nor have they or their successors done so since.

Some of these purchasers have tendered the remaining three-fourths due since the expiration of the three years, and it has been received by the commissioners.

These lands upon which the three-fourths have not been paid are now in possession of the United States, and are being rented under the direction of a collector of internal revenue. The purchasers are now in doubt as to whether they are safe in paying the remainder due, and are waiting some action by which they may be assured of the validity of their title if they pay the remainder due.

These lands are located in the town of Beaufort, South Carolina, including a large part of that town, and upon the islands adjacent thereto, comprising some of the most prominent places in that section of the country.

From a knowledge of the depressing influences and paralyzing effects upon the prosperity of this section of the country, occasioned by the unsettled titles to so large an amount of lands, I deem a special notice in this connection justifiable, and early action on the part of Congress, by which these titles shall be settled beyond reasonable doubt and controversy important.

From the statements herein set forth, it will be seen that the amount of taxes apportioned by act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, remaining uncollected, is $3,480,681.51½, of which $2,661,782.62 remain charged against the several tracts or lots of land in the eleven late insurrectionary States, upon which the taxes which were assessed and charged have not been paid; and that there is authority vested in the President and Secretary of the Treasury for completing the collections.

Also, that there is quite an amount of lands owned by the United States, under the provisions of the United States direct-tax acts, which it is important Congress should take early action in relation to; and about $150,000 due on deferred payments in South Carolina, which I am of the opinion should be collected at an early date, or the lands upon which these three-fourths payments are due resold in pursuance with the conditions of sale set forth in the President's instructions and the certificates of sale herein referred to.

At the present session of Congress a number of bills were introduced by various members, all of which were referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and by it referred to a sub-committee, of which I was one. They were all carefully considered and submitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the following letter received from him. The first three sections of the bill are in strict accordance with and embrace all the amendments made to the Hunton bill by the Commissioner:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, April 27, 1874.

SIR: In response to your verbal request that this office should make a report of its views in regard to the several bills introduced in the House of Representatives relating to direct taxes, I have to submit the following:

Bill H. R. No. 2499, introduced by Mr. Herndon.—This bill repeals the direct-tax laws so far as they relate to the late insurrectionary States, refunds all money collected therein on that account, and restores all lands sold for default of payment unconditionally to the original owner. This seems very objectionable. The loyal States, which have assumed and paid this tax, would be equally entitled to this refunding, and the restoration of lands to the original owners, unaccompanied by any provision for the reimbursement of the purchasers at tax sale, would be an act of bad faith on the part of the United States. It is not believed that this bill in its present shape can receive the serious consideration of your committee, Bill H. R. No. 2286, introduced by Mr. Mills.—This bill repeals the act of August 5, 1861, which was the original direct-tax act, apportioning $20,000,000, to be raised by direct taxation among the States; and it further releases all the taxes remaining uncollected under said act. The amount of these taxes uncollected is about $3,400,000, of which about $2,600,000 is due from the late insurrectionary States. Congress has by several enactments postponed the collection of these taxes. The last postponement was to January 1, 1869, since which date there has been no law prohibiting such collection; but in deference to the presumed will of Congress, as shown by these repeated postponements, no action in that direction has been taken by the Treasury Department. Whether the law should be repealed altogether and the uncollected taxes released, as contemplated by this bill, is a question in regard to which this office does not feel authorized to express an opinion, but deems it a proper subject for the consideration of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Bill H. R. No. 2882, introduced by Mr. Sener.—This bill releases the claims of the United States to rents on lands sold for direct taxes in Accomac and Northampton Counties, Virginia, and bid in for the Government and now claimed as belonging to the United States. The first objection which suggests itself relative to this bill is its local character. The statements in the preamble as to many of the present claimants of the lands having acquired title thereto, for valuable consideration, in ignorance of any claim of title thereto on the part of the United States, and that gross injustice would be done them by holding them responsible for the rents that have accrued since the acquisition of title by the United States, would apply equally to Memphis, Tennessee, and also to Florida, where most of the property was in the same condition.

While there would seem to be a certain justice in releasing these rents to innocent purchasers, it is to be noted that considerable sums have been collected for rents of direct-tax lands in South Carolina, and in some cases the original owners themselves have been the tenants.

Would not the release in one case raise an equitable claim for the refunding to the owners of all rents received by the United States, especially where the lands have since been restored to them, and if so, would it be the policy of Congress to refund these rents? The second objection to the bill is, that it appears to be so loosely drawn as to accomplish more than it intends, and would release not only rents, but the tax, interest, and costs due on said lands.

Bill H. R. No. 2336, introduced by Mr. Maynard.—The first section of this bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to proceed in the collection of the direct tax. In regard to this subject I would refer you to the comments hereinbefore made on the bill of Mr. MILLS. The ten sections following contain various provisions, all designed for the relief or security of purchasers at tax sales. While many of these provisions seem unobjectionable, others are more questionable; but as they consist principally of directions to the courts as to rules of evidence, comment by this office is hardly called for. Attention is specially called to section 12 of this bill, which provides among other things for the refunding of all penalties collected previous to the actual sale of lands. As under the act of June 7, 1862, all direct taxes in the insurrectionary States were levied with 50 per cent. additional as a penalty, (see section 1 of said act,) the passage of the section would involve the refunding of upward of a million and a quarter of dollars on the account of penalties alone.

When it is found that this amount would have to be distributed in very small sums, among many thousand claimants, whose rights thereto from the lapse of time and other causes would in many cases be very difficult to determine, the doubtful expediency of this section will appear quite evident.

Bill H. R. No. 1191, introduced by Mr. Hunton.—The first section provides for the repayment to the original owners of the purchase-money received by the United States on the sale of their property, less the tax, interest, and costs, for which it was sold, on condition that the original owner executes to the tax-sale purchaser a quit-claim deed for the lands including a release of mesne profits.

The second section provides where there is a dispute about title a method for refunding through the instrumentality of the courts.

The third section provides in certain cases where it shall be shown that the tax commissioners made it their invariable rule and practice not to receive the taxes unless the same were tendered by the owner in proper person, the purchase-money shall be refunded to the purchaser on condition that he executes a quit-claim deed to the original owner.

The principles of this bill are believed to be equitable and destined sooner or later to receive the sanction of Congress. In fact the last Congress passed two private bills (see acts for relief of James T. Johnson and George and Sallie Washington, pages 651 and 767, 17 Statutes) doing exactly the same thing in particular cases which the first section of this bill would do for all entitled to the same relief, and it is thought that this measure would do more to quiet title and prevent litigation in regard to these direct-tax lands than any other measure that has yet been devised, particularly in Virginia, where the late decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Tacy vs. Irwin has unsettled all the tax titles derived from the United States in that State.

This bill has already received the approval of the House Committee on the Revision of the Laws. The amount of money that would be liable to be refunded under its provisions is estimated at between six and seven hundred thousand dollars. Should the committee be of the opinion that this amount can be spared from the revenues at this time, I would recommend the passage of this bill with the following amendments:

In section 1, in line 14, insert after the word "act" the words "except lands sold in South Carolina at Army and Navy sales on which only partial payments were made." In these cases the lands have reverted to the United States, and have either been restored to the original owners or may be, under the act of June 8, 1872.

In section 3, in line 18, insert after the word "pay" the words "on their application and surrender of tax-sale certificate."

In section 3 strike out from and including the words "with interest" in line 23 to and including the words "United States" in line 25.

The purchasers having had the use of the lands, it is not believed that they are entitled to interest.

Attention is called to the word invariable in line 14 of section 3. It is not thought that it can be shown that any of the boards of commissioners made this their invariable rule and practice during the entire incumbency of their offices. So, unless the word is stricken out, it is doubtful if any relief could be obtained under this section.

The bill as amended by this office is herewith inclosed.

Very respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK, M. C.,
Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

Sections 4, 5, and 6 are without change a bill drawn by the Department and submitted to the committee at our request, accompanied by the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., May 16, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to offer the following explanation of the bill H. R. No. 3346, amendatory of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption and sale of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes," approved June 8, 1872, introduced by you on the 14th instant, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and which I am desirous should be passed at the present session of Congress.

The first section provides for the extension of the time allowed for redemption for one year from the 8th of June, 1874. Unless this is so amended the time will expire at the last-mentioned date, which would result in considerable hardship, especially in South Carolina, owing to the confusion of boundaries, the difficulties of proving title, in consequence of the destruction of the records in the court-house of Beaufort County during the rebellion, and the general impoverishment of the claimants.

The second section provides a rule for a settlement with purchasers at Army and Navy sales. The terms of section 5 of the act of June 8, 1872, were indefinite, and the construction placed thereon by this office, namely, that the parties should pay 10 per cent. interest on the deferred payment without allowance for rent, was not acceptable to the parties, although regarded as in strict accordance with the law. The terms proposed in the amendment are those which had been allowed to these parties up to the date of the passage of the act of June 8, 1872, and are believed to be just and equitable.

The third section removes the uncertainty which was felt in the construction of section 7, relative to the lands to be exempted from redemption. It is believed that it was the intention of Congress to include the school farms in South Carolina remaining unsold in the lands to be redeemed, but the terms of the act seemed to exclude them; and it is also believed that it was not intended to exempt lands reserved for military, naval, and other public purposes, unless actually heretofore set apart for such purpose by the proper authorities.

The adoption of this bill will take no money out of the Treasury; on the contrary it will be a means of increasing the revenues, and its passage is respectfully urged.

Very respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK, M. C.,
Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

Section 7 was inserted to cover all the classes of cases embraced in the bill of Mr. SENER. The letter of the Commissioner explains that matter. It reads thus:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, May 19, 1874.

SIR: Hon. J. B. SENER, member of Congress from Virginia, is desirous that some provision should be added to the bill to amend the act of June 8, 1872, relative to the redemption of lands sold for direct taxes submitted by this office (H. R. No. 3346) which should embody the purpose of his bill for the release of rents on direct tax-lands in Accomac and Northampton Counties, Virginia, (H. R. No. 2882.)

You will find his bill commented on in my letter to you of the 27th ultimo, reviewing all the bills on the subject of direct tax presented to the House up to that time.

The main objection to the purpose of this bill is that the release of rents to some of the original owners of these lands would raise an equitable claim that the rents actually received by the United States from the lands of others should be refunded to them. Whether this course of legislation should be entered upon is a matter resting within the discretion of Congress. If any provision of this kind is to be adopted, I would recommend the following as a substitute for his bill:

"That when the United States have not been in possession of the land, a release therefor, in conformity with the provisions of the act of June 8, 1872, shall also operate as a release and assignment to the party to whom the release is made to the rents that may have accrued thereon since the United States acquired title thereto."

Very respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK, M. C.,
Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

I think these letters and reports will enable the House to act intelligently, even if we are compelled to move to pass it under a suspension of the rules, which will cut off explanation as a matter of course. It is for the purpose of giving the necessary information that I now lay these papers before the House.

The bill, with amendments, was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole.

SMITH & MATTHEWS.

Mr. BURCHARD, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3668) for the relief of Smith & Matthews, of Illinois; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill directs the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to examine the application of Smith & Matthews, formerly owners of registered distillery No. 2, district No. 3, Dixon, Illinois, for rebate of deficiency tax arising from the blowing up of their distillery January 10, 1872, and to refund the amount found due, not exceeding $383.85, and appropriates a sum sufficient for that purpose.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BURCHARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MERCHANDISE SUNK FOR TWO YEARS AND RECOVERED.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 3539) to admit free of duty merchandise sunk for two years and afterward recoverd.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that whenever any ship or vessel, laden with merchandise in whole or in part subject to duty, shall have been sunk in any river, harbor, bay, or waters subject to the jurisdiction of the United States and within its limits, and shall have remained so sunk for the period of not less than two years, and shall be abandoned by the owners thereof, any person or persons who may raise any portion of the cargo of such ship or vessel shall be permitted to bring the merchandise so recovered into the port nearest to the place where such ship or vessel was so sunk free from the payment of any duty thereupon, and without being obliged to enter the same at the custom-house, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Does this bill provide that all cargoes of railroad iron, &c., shall come in free of duty?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The only point of the bill is this; under the act of 1843, if a ship is raised after having been sunk for two years or more, the cargo may come in free of duty. This bill provides that even if the ship be not raised, but if the cargo is recovered under precisely the same conditions, it may come in free of duty. That is all there is in the bill.

The bill was passed.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS, ETC.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3669) to admit free of duty photographic and lithographic prints and philosophical apparatus, books, and instruments of scientific research, imported for educational and scientific purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides, in its first section, that all photographic and lithographic prints, pictures, or views, or plaster or other models, specially imported in good faith for the use of any school, college, university, society, or institution, incorporated or established for philosophical, educational, and literary purposes, or encouragement of the fine arts, and not intended for sale, may be admitted into the United States free of duty, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and all such photographs and lithographs or models so imported, now held for payment of duties in any custom-house of the United States, shall be surrendered to such importer without payment of duties upon proof being made, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that such importation is made in good faith, for the purposes herein described; provided that in case any article so imported under the provisions of this act shall be sold, it shall be subject to the duties, if any, imposed on such objects by the revenue laws in force at the date of importation.

The second section provides that all philosophical apparatus, books, and instruments of scientific research, imported by any officer of any scientific Bureau of the Government at his own cost, and for use in connection with such Bureau, shall be surrendered to such officer without payment of duties, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is not this bill liable to the point of order which will require its first consideration in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Then I think it should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. Before the bill is sent to the Committee of the Whole I desire to offer an amendment to go with the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole now.

Mr. CONGER. I want to move an amendment to go with that bill, to insert individuals as well as corporations. I see no reason why a scientific corporation should have rights which are not allowed to a scientific individual.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order, because the bill is not before the House.

Mr. CONGER. I understood that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] withdrew his point of order till I could make the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Vermont withdraw the point of order?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I am willing to withdraw it for the purpose of allowing the gentleman to offer an amendment, though I presume he can move it in Committee of the Whole when the bill comes up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman withdraws the point of order for the purpose of allowing an amendment, that is discussing the bill in the House, and the point is thereby waived.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Then I do not withdraw the point.

ADVERSE REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back adversely a number of bills and to move that they be laid on the table. The first is the bill (H. R. No. 82) declaratory of the meaning of section 39 of the act of June 6, 1872, entitled "An act to reduce duties on imports and to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes."

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I suppose that bill can go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. If any gentleman objects to laying it on the table, it will be sent to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. Can a bill reported adversely be sent to the Committee of the Whole on a point of order?

The SPEAKER. Of course. The Chair has several times ruled upon that point; and the gentleman will see the reason for the ruling. When an adverse report is made the question is, Will the House lay the bill on the table? If it be not laid on the table, the question is, Will the House order the bill to be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. GARFIELD. I should think that at that stage the point could be made.

The SPEAKER. But that would enable the House by laying the bill on the table to decide its fate without discussion.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; and therefore to permit a bill reported adversely to be laid on the table when any member desired its consideration in Committee of the Whole, would be deciding the fate of possibly an important bill without discussion, which the rules do not contemplate. There is, however, nothing in the rules that compels a committee, unless they are called upon by the House, to report back any proposition to which they are adverse. The Chair has several times reminded committees of this fact.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I wish this bill to go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to laying the bill on the table, it will be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table:

A bill (H. R. No. 161) to abolish the tax on cigars, tobacco, and snuff, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 243) to remit the duties upon certain goods destroyed by fire at the late conflagration in the city of Boston;

A bill (H. R. No. 244) to repeal the tax imposed upon deposits in savings-banks and institutions for savings;

A bill (H. R. No. 317) to repeal the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869;

A bill (H. R. No. 332) to repeal all taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and to provide for the deficiency in the revenue occasioned thereby;

A bill (H. R. No. 539) for the issue of convertible bonds and the reduction of the interest on the funded debt of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 789) to remove all internal taxes or duties from apple brandy distilled and manufactured in the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 836) to remove all internal-revenue taxes from apple, peach, grape, or fruit brandy manufactured in the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 1123) to repeal the internal duties upon tobacco;

A bill (H. R. No. 1113) to amend the revenue law so as to permit the storage of manufactured tobacco in warehouses;

A bill (H. R. No. 1069) to reorganize the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and to reduce the expenses of the internal-revenue service;

A bill (H. R. No. 1449) to facilitate the collection of duties on merchandise imported into the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 1638) to amend paragraph 6 of section 110 of the internal-revenue law, act of March 3, 1865, amended July 13, 1866;

A bill (H. R. No. 1733) to amend customs laws;

A bill (H. R. No. 1795) construing section 14 of the act entitled "An act to increase duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864;

A bill (H. R. No. 1805) to repeal the internal-revenue taxes on spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1957) repealing the tax on lucifer matches, and increasing the tax on distilled spirits;

A bill (H. R. No. 2057) to increase the tax on distilled spirits;

A bill (H. R. No. 2126) to abolish the offices of Commissioner of Internal Revenue and Commissioner of Customs, and many subordinate offices, and creating the offices of Commissioner of Revenues and deputy commissioners;

A bill (H. R. No. 2157) to increase the currency and provide for its interconversion with Government bonds, to abolish the sinking fund for the reduction of the principal of the public debt, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 2268) for the relief of John A. Fitch, of Chicago, Illinois;

A bill (H. R. No. 2725) to provide for refunding certain tax illegally collected from distillers of fruit;

A bill (H. R. No. 2813) regulating the compensation and appointment of appraisers of merchandise at the port of Savannah, Georgia;

A bill (H. R. No. 1540) to prevent officers of the United States receiving or being paid any money beyond their fixed salaries;

A bill (H. R. No. 3135) to provide for the interconversion of legal-tender notes and interest-bearing bonds, and to reduce the interest on the public debt;

A bill (H. R. No. 3121) to facilitate the resumption of specie payments, and to prevent fluctuations in the value of United States notes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3157) to provide temporary relief against further present taxation, &c.

Mr. DAWES also, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 701) authorizing the issue of three sixty-five convertible bonds, to provide for their interchangability with legal tender-notes, and to lessen the interest on the public debt; and moved that the same be laid on the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to laying this bill on the table, and ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The bill was so referred.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 726) to impose a tax upon incomes over $3,000, and to revive certain acts in relation thereto; and moved that the same be laid on the table.

Mr. FORT. I ask that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The bill was so referred.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 1205) to repeal the duties on salt; and moved that the same be laid on the table.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The bill was so referred.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 1689) to tax buffalo hides; and moved that the same be laid on the table.

Mr. FORT. I ask the reference of this bill to the Committee of the Whole.

The bill was so referred.

DISTILLED SPIRITS DESTROYED IN BOND.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3670) to amend section 1 of the act of May 27, 1872, entitled "An act to provide for the abatement or repayment of taxes on distilled spirits in bond destroyed by casualty;" which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that section 1 of the act approved May 27, 1872, entitled "An act to provide for the abatement or repayment of taxes on distillled spirits in bond destroyed by casualty," be amended by adding the words "cistern-room" before the words "distillery warehouse," where the same occur in the first section of said act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMISSION OF DUTIES ON ACCOUNT OF BOSTON FIRE.

Mr. DAWES also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3671) to remit the duties on certain goods destroyed by the Boston fire at the late conflagration in the city of Boston; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read.

Mr. KILLINGER. I make the point of order on this bill that it must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAWES. I will state for the information of the House——

Mr. KILLINGER. I insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes a point of order. He will state his point of order.

Mr. KILLINGER. My point of order is that it takes money out of the Treasury, and must under the rule have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAWES. Let me suggest it does not take any money out of the Treasury. It is a copy of the New York relief-bill.

Mr. KILLINGER. I rise to a point of order. Is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is hearing the gentleman from Massachusetts on that very point.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to suggest to the Speaker what is the general character of this bill. When the New York bill was before the House the same point of order was raised and the matter went through a very thorough and general discussion at that time. The Speaker ruled it was not liable to the point of order, and the bill was considered in the House. This bill is a copy of that bill precisely, and the same relief is afforded here as is afforded in the New York case.

Mr. BECK. Before that is passed on I desire to say that the chairman has not stated on this bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means that it is not a unanimous report from that committee.

Mr. DAWES. I meant to state that when the bill came up for discussion—that it is not a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BECK. I and others on that committee object to the passage of the bill.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I would inquire of the Chair whether a new rule was not adopted since the ruling of the Speaker in the case of the New York bill, and whether under the new ruling all these cases do not go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for their first consideration?

Mr. DAWES. There has been a new ruling, but whether it affects this bill or not, it is for the Speaker to decide.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts argue that the bill he presents is not liable to the point of order?

Mr. DAWES. I argue that this is precisely like the New York bill which was decided by the then Speaker as not subject to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House have changed considerably since then. The Chair understands the scope of this to be as follows: that a commission shall determine the amount of goods which were lost on which duties had been paid and bonds for that amount shall be credited to the losers.

Mr. DAWES. Which shall pass at the custom-house for duties.

The SPEAKER. But of course the gentleman will observe that that changes the mode of paying duties in so far as the bill goes. The goods which would be imported but for this bill would necessarily have to pay the duties in gold coin. This bill says that in so far as it reaches, the duties may be paid in a different form of value from that. The Chair thinks there is no doubt that it should have its first discussion in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It does not go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It does not, being a public bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and was ordered to be printed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER. I rise to make a privileged report. I present a report from the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 11 and 15.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7 and 16, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out of said House amendment the words "and the Signal Corps," and insert in lieu thereof the word "which;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3 and 4, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out of the text of the bill all from and including the word "provided" in line 9, page 2 of the bill, down to and including the word "transportation," being the last proviso of the paragraph; strike out also the words of amendment numbered 4; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same as so amended.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: Amend the text of the bill by inserting after the word "accounts," line 8, page 9 of the bill, (section 2,) the words "as have been reported to him for payment by the Quartermaster's and Commissary Departments"; and the Senate agree to the same.

W. A. WHEELER,

JOHN A. LOGAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WHEELER. Unless some gentleman desires information as to the recommendations of the committee, I move that the report be agreed to.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Reports are still in order from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DAWES. The committee have no further reports to present to-day.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I give notice that to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal, or at the expiration of the morning hour if there should be one, I shall move that the rules be suspended and that reports from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds may be considered in the House. I now ask unanimous consent that the bill S. No. 716 and the bill S. No. 448 be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order.

GENEVA AWARD.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the House resumes the consideration of the substitute reported from the Committee on the Judiciary for the bill (S. No. 7) for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] is entitled to the floor, with half of his hour remaining.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BASS.]

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. The gentleman from New York yields for a moment to me that I may ask unanimous consent to have the bills I indicated a moment ago taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been demanded, the gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. BASS. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to detain the House by any remarks on the subject of the Geneva award, but under the courtesy of the gentleman from Indiana, who has permitted me to occupy a portion of his time, I will state the reasons why I am unable to support the proposition advanced by the majority of the committee, and why it ought not to be sustained by this House. The ground upon which they base their claim, as indicated by their report, is that the fund of $15,500,000 now in the possession of the United States is charged with no trust whatever; that it is in the nature of a penalty received by this Government from Great Britain; and that therefore it is to be distributed by this Government according to such principles as we may arbitrarily determine, free and discharged from any obligations or lien implied from the treaty or proceedings before the tribunal which awarded the money.

As a conclusion upon this branch of the case the committee use the following language:

Your committee therefore have approached the subject of indemnification for losses of our citizens, by the acts of cruisers, in the firm belief that this money is the money of the United States, free from all legal or equitable claims of any person whatever, to be dealt with by the Government according to its own views of the claims of its citizens upon itself, and the moral duty to afford such relief as may seem just.

I cannot assent, and I do not think the facts in the case will permit this House to assent, to this doctrine. What was the foundation of the claim against Great Britain, under which we received $15,500,000? Was not the money awarded to this Government as an indemnity for certain specified damages which had been inflicted upon citizens of the United States in the destruction of their property by confederate cruisers. As is well known to every gentleman who hears me, early after the tribunal was organized, at one of its first sessions, the United States by its counsel presented to that tribunal five general classes of losses for which indemnity was claimed. Permit me to again call the attention of the House to them:

First, The claims for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by insurgent cruisers.

Second. The national expenditures in the pursuit of those cruisers.

Third. The losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag.

Fourth. The enhanced payment of insurance; and,

Fifth. The prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion.

I refer the House to the case of the United States, (volume 1, pages 185, 186, and 188,) which I hold in my hand, as proof that pecuniary compensation was demanded by us for no losses or injuries not included in the specifications stated. Following the presentation of the American case, England claimed that certain of the classes of claims were not included within the terms of the treaty, and that she would not consent to submit them to arbitration.

On the 19th of June, 1872, the arbitrators declared "that after the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of the claims for—

First. The losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag;

Second. The enhanced payment of insurance;

Third. The prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion—

They have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations, and should upon such principles, be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award.

It appears by the records in the case that this decision of the tribunal was immediately communicated by our agent at Geneva to the Secretary of State, and on the 22d day of June Mr. Fish telegraphed him that he was directed by the President to say that he accepted the declaration of the tribunal as its judgment upon a question of public law which he had felt that the interests of both governments required should be decided, and for the determination of which he had felt it important to present the claims referred to for the purpose of taking the opinion of the tribunal. In the same dispatch he further uses this language:

The President, therefore, further accepts the opinion and advice of the counsel as set forth above, and authorizes the announcement to the tribunal that he accepts their declaration as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law upon which he had felt it his duty to seek the expression of their opinion, and that in accordance with such judgment and opinion, from henceforth he regards the claims set forth in the case presented on the part of the United States for loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag, the enhanced payment of insurance, and the prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion as adjudicated and disposed of; and that consequently they will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, but are henceforth excluded from its consideration by the tribunal in making its award.

And on the 27th day of June, at a meeting of the tribunal, our agent stated that—

The declaration made by the tribunal, individually and collectively, respecting the claims presented by the United States for the award of the tribunal for—first, the losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag; second, the enhanced payments of insurance; and third, the prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war, and the suppression of the rebellion, is accepted by the President of the United States as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law involved.

The agent of the United States is authorized to say that, consequently, the above-mentioned claims will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration in any award that may be made.

And thereupon, on the same day, as appears by the protocol—

Count Sclopis, on behalf of all the arbitrators, then declared that the several claims for indirect losses mentioned in the statement made by the agent of the United States on the 25th instant, and referred to in the statement just made by the agent of Her Britannic Majesty, are, and from henceforth shall be, wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal, and directed the secretary to embody this declaration in the protocol of this day's proceedings.

It thus appears that at that stage of the proceedings the claim for "enhanced payments of insurance," known by this House during the discussion as "war premiums," was rejected by the tribunal as furnishing no ground upon which the United States could claim pecuniary compensation from Great Britain, as were the other claims for losses in the transfer of our marine to the British flag, and the prolongation and cost of the war, those being regarded as "indirect" losses, too remote to justify any award whatever. Yet the gentlemen presenting the majority report now assert to this House that those who paid enhanced premiums of insurance during the war, and whose claims were thus expressly overruled at Geneva, are entitled to participate in the distribution of this fund which is in no degree based upon the allowance of claims of that character; and to make the assertion more audacious, it is said that such participation is to be had to the exclusion of the claims of those citizens which furnished the real basis upon which compensation has been actually rendered.

But let us go one step further and determine if we can the precise ground upon which the tribunal proceeded in making its award. Without stopping to examine in detail the arguments that led to the conclusion, it will be seen by protocol 27, on page 43 of the report, that "the tribunal proceeded to consider the questions concerning the claims for expenditure incurred in pursuit of the cruisers," and as to those claims, "a majority of the tribunal decided to reject them as comprised in the cost of the war."

When they made their final award they decided in terms that they made it as compensation for claims for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by insurgent cruisers, and upon that basis, as will be seen by the details of the award, the arbitrators computed the amount due the United States, or rather the amount which individual citizens of the United States had lost by reason of the destruction of vessels and cargoes upon the high seas. It was upon the computation of that amount that they made the award to the United States. I desire to call the attention of the House to the details of the award by reason of this class of losses. I read from the report as my time is so limited that I cannot detain the House to go into this matter at length, but I desire to call especial attention to the computations which were made by one of the commissioners, Mr. Staempfli, and which are reported in the minority report of the Judiciary Committee on page 16. I will ask the Clerk to read the passage I have marked from that report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the 2d of September Mr. Staempfli, one of the arbitrators, presented "an estimate for the determination of a sum in gross to be awarded."

This estimate stated the value of the American claims for ships, cargoes, and freights destroyed at $14,437,000. These same claims were admitted by Great Britain to be in value $7,074,000. This made the mean value of these individual claims, as asserted by the American and admitted by the British government, $10,905,000, to which sum he added the sum of $988,000 for prospective wages and increased value of vessels, making the gross mean estimate of $11,833,000; and he proposed a round sum of $12,000,000 to be awarded, with interest at 5, 6, or 7 per cent., as might be determined.

At that very meeting Sir Alexander Cockburn presented "a memorandum of corrections in Mr. Staempfli's estimate" of the American specific claims, which reduced those claims at the valuation our Government put upon them, by deductions for double claims, and gross freights, by	$3,635,819

Making the total as the American valuation of the claims allowed	10,801,324
As against the British estimate of them, of	7,464,764
The mean of these two sums is	9,133,044

Add to this Mr. Staempfli's allowance for fishing craft and whalers in lieu of prospective catch:

One year's wages	$588,000
Twenty-five per cent. on the value of vessels	400,000
		988,000
Giving for the allowed claims of American citizens for ships and cargoes lost, by Sir Alexander Cockburn's statement		10,121,044

as the total which should be awarded for those direct claims at the mean or average value asserted for them by our and allowed by the British government.

Now, if to this mean between the value claimed by our Government for the losses upon ships, goods, and cargoes destroyed, as to which Great Britain was found liable, and the value therefor admitted by Great Britain, being $10,121,044, be added interest at 6 per cent., (at which rate Sir Alexander Cockburn states interest was allowed, and the award in terms embraces interest, we shall have the sum of $15,409,289.69; or, in round figures, $15,500,000, to be awarded.

Mr. BASS. Mr. Speaker, it appears by that statement, the veracity of which is established by the records of the tribunal, that this sum of $15,500,000, in round numbers, was awarded by the tribunal of arbitration, because of the specific losses of American citizens upon the high seas, growing out of the first, and only the first, class of claims to which I called your attention, "claims for losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the insurgent cruisers." Yet it is now urged upon the House that those citizens who have suffered losses upon the high seas, and for which this money has been paid to the United States shall be excluded from even a hearing in court in the distribution of this award, and that claims which were rejected by the arbitrators shall be allowed, to wit: the enhanced war premiums. Permit me to ask gentlemen on the other side of this question how much would have been awarded to the United States if the claims based on enhanced war premiums alone had been submitted to the tribunal as the foundation for the claim for compensation to American citizens? They were regarded as indirect claims, and they were rejected from the beginning to the end, in whole and in every part, and not a dollar would have been paid to the United States had the claim which is made by the war-premium men to the nation to-day been the sole claim made before the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva.

Sir, the award was made to indemnify American citizens for the direct loss of their property upon the high seas, whether insured or uninsured, and I maintain that this Government has received, and now holds the award, charged with the execution of the terms of that trust according to the well-settled rules of the law, and we have no right to allow the fund to be diverted into any other channel.

There seems to be no controversy as to a part of this proposition, it being conceded that those citizens who were uninsured, and suffered direct losses in the manner stated, are first to receive indemnity from this fund. These claims are estimated at a little less than $3,000,000, exclusive of interest. But it is asserted that as to the remaining losses of property for which compensation and indemnity was thus placed in the hands of the United States, there is no one worthy or entitled to participate in the fund. That the owners were all insured against capture, and upon capture they received full indemnity from the insurance companies, and that the insurance companies received full indemnity from their premiums of insurance. Therefore diligent search is to be made for some one else wholly worthy and not unwilling to set up a claim to the undistributed fund.

When and by whom have the insurers been indemnified? Is it pretended that the insurance companies received from the premiums of insurance upon the specified vessels and cargoes which were made the victims of these marauding cruisers moneys sufficient to indemnify them against the losses they have actually paid upon the destruction of the same property? War premiums ran high in those days; but they did not amount to confiscation, and hardly averaged 5 per cent.; and so I repeat the question, from whom and when in any given case did any underwriter receive indemnity? There is no answer; none can be given, except to allege that the accumulation of premiums upon risks taken upon property other than that which was the subject of the controversy with Great Britain enabled the usurer to keep faith with the unfortunate owners of property which was captured and destroyed, and which furnished the basis of the award now in our hands.

Is it good morals or good law to say that I shall be excused from paying you my debt because you have made a profitable venture out of my neighbor?

Upon what idea of justice can we deprive the underwriter of his claim and bestow this fund upon a class of claimants who received no recognition at the hands of the august court at Geneva, and furnished no foundation for right of recompense during the entire controversy?

But, sir, the fact appears that as to a large amount of the property captured and destroyed by the insurgent cruisers as to which Great Britain failed to discharge her duty toward us as a neutral, and was held liable, the underwriters were mutual insurance companies, organized under the laws of the State of New York, and the profits made, if any, were the profits of the insured and not the insurer, and were distributed among those citizens who had held policies in such companies.

How is it known that the underwriters have or have not made profits on these adventures? Although the issue is immaterial, may we not with equal justice ask, have not the men who paid "war premiums" made profits on the adventures they insured? Were they not voluntary adventures? If the merchants in New York or elsewhere desired to import their cargoes in American bottoms, and were willing to pay the increased premiums because they could get cheaper freights than in British bottoms, are we not then equally entitled to ask if those who paid war premiums have not made money, and ask to have a statement of the account made? They could obtain cheaper rates of freight in American bottoms because they were subjected to these risks; and they paid the increased war premium voluntarily, because they desired to make an adventure in that way. And when the underwriter as claimant is asked to state an account to the end that there may be mere indemnity, well may it be asked of those who paid war premiums to state an account and show whether they have not received compensation for the extra premiums they have paid.

But, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the question in this case is to be definitely decided upon far different doctrines than those suggested, and upon well-established legal principles. The underwriter is a surety. Upon loss of the property insured, the insurer, according to the acknowledged laws of the land, is subrogated to all the rights of the assured. It is by the law-merchant a part of the contract of insurance, and the rate of premium is presumed to be based upon such subrogation.

And in this connection I wish to call attention to the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Comegys et al. vs. Vasse, in 1 Peters, 215, which was a case involving some of the questions which enter into this discussion. The question arose as to the distribution of a fund which the United States received from Spain under the treaty of 1819, providing for an indemnity to American citizens whose property had been illegally captured by Spain upon the high seas.

I read from the opinion written by Justice Story:

"Where (says Mr. Marshall) as in case of capture, the thing insured and every part of it is completely gone out of the power of the insured, it is just and proper that he should recover at once, as for a total loss, and leave the spes recuperandi to the insurer, who will have the benefit of a recapture, or of any other accident by which the thing may be recovered." Mr. Park uses equally strong language; he says "the insured has a right to call upon the underwriter for a total loss, and of course to abandon, as soon as he hears of such a calamity having happened, his claim to an indemnity not being at all suspended by the chance of a future recovery of part of the property lost, because by the abandonment that chance devolves upon the underwriters." It is very clear that neither of these learned writers meant to confine these remarks to cases where the specific property itself, or its proceeds, were restored, for the whole current of their reasoning in the context goes to show that whatever may be afterward recovered or received, whether in the course of judicial proceedings or otherwise, as a compensation for the loss, belongs to the underwriters, and for this purpose they refer to the case of Randall vs. Cochran, (1 Ves., 98,) before Lord Hardwicke, where this very point was adjudged. In that case the king had granted letters of reprisal against the Spaniards for the benefit of his subjects, in consideration of the losses which they had sustained by unjust captures, and he appointed commissioners to distribute the produce of these reprisals among the sufferers, and the commissioners would not suffer the underwriters, but only the owners, to make claim for the losses, although the owners were already satisfied for their loss by the underwriters. Lord Hardwicke decreed that the owners should account for the same to the underwriters, and said, "the person who originally sustained the loss was the owner, but after satisfaction made to him, the insurer. No doubt but from that time, as to the goods themselves, if restored in specie or compensation made for them, the insured stood as a trustee for the insurer, in proportion to what he paid, although the commissioners did right to avoid being entangled in accounts, and in adjusting the proportion between them. Their commission was limited in time; they saw who was owner; nor was it material to whom he assigned his interest, as it was in effect after satisfaction made."

Justice Story, writing the opinion, says on the next page:

The right to indemnity for an unjust capture, whether against the captors or the sovereign; whether remediable in his own courts, or by his own extraordinary interposition and grants upon private petition, or upon public negotiation, is a right attached to the ownership of the property itself, and passes by cession to the use of the ultimate sufferer. If so assignable to Vasse, it was equally, in its own nature, capable of assignment to others, and the only remaining inquiry would be whether it had so passed by assignment from him.

Who in this case were the ultimate sufferers? The immediate sufferers were the owners of the property—of the vessels and their cargoes. The underwriter paid the owner his loss, and therefore the ultimate sufferer was the underwriter who has paid the amount of his policy, and who by every principle of law and of justice is entitled to the indemnity which Great Britain has paid the United States in this case.

But I desire before my time expires to call the attention of the House to the particular feature of the bill of the committee which proposes to exclude from all hearing before the tribunal or court to distribute this fund any claim by underwriters, except upon a statement of account. And the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] proposes an amendment which is designed arbitrarily to prohibit insurers any admission whatever to the court to contest their claims. Are these gentlemen so weak in their faith in the justice of their own views that they dare not admit all claimants in open court? Are not the judicial tribunals to be trusted in this case as in others?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I had not desired to take any part whatever in this debate, and consequently yielded all but ten minutes of the time to which I was entitled to gentlemen on this floor who had constituencies who were more or less interested in the matters that are now under consideration. But on yesterday I found my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] struggling for some words which in his judgment would properly characterize this bill and the principles upon which it has been framed. Finally, after severely cudgeling his brain to that end, and with that solemn and hoary-headed gravity which characterizes him and which carries so much weight upon the floor of this House, he called it stealing as the mildest form of expression that he could use consistently with the decorum of parliamentary debate. I thought that under the circumstances it would be well for me to say a word as to the reason why I did not think that I was assisting anybody in stealing anything from these insurance companies when I was aiding in framing the bill that is now under consideration.

Now, in order to make out this indictment which the gentleman from Vermont has so gravely presented before this House, that somebody is going to steal something from these insurance companies, let me call the attention of the House to the very extraordinary position which must be assumed in order to sustain that charge. It is simply this: that the United States when it went to Geneva before that august tribunal went there simply as a claim agent or an attorney, without even a contingent fee, and agreeing to pay the costs itself in case no judgment was obtained, for the purpose of collecting claims for certain corporations and individuals. Now, I apprehend that the United States went before that tribunal in no such capacity, but went there in its sovereign capacity as a sovereign power to vindicate its honor, to establish rules of international law, and for the purpose of procuring such money indemnity as it might be able.

Its honor was vindicated by that tribunal, rules of international law were established, (I presume they do not belong to these insurance companies,) and money indemnity was secured. Now, for the purpose of procuring that money indemnity the United States had the right to use and present just such claims as she saw proper; to use just such instrumentalities as she might see fit, for the purpose of establishing an amount which Great Britain was to pay to the United States as an indemnity for the wrongs inflicted by virtue of her conduct. And upon these claims that were presented an award was made, and thus was obtained this $15,500,000 which is the bone of contention among these parties before the House to-day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, according to my view of all this business, this money thus derived is to all intents and purposes the money of the United States. And thus far I think my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] my colleague on the committee, who will probably soon have the floor, will agree with me. I say that to all intents and purposes it is the money of the United States, procured in the manner that I have indicated; and it is money that the United States holds and has the right to dispose of according to her own sovereign will and pleasure; and it is money that must be disposed of according to those high conceptions of the dealings of nations which have been crystallized into that adage that "the king can do no wrong."

Now, then, what should be done with this money thus acquired by the United States, not as anybody's claim agent or paid attorney or unpaid attorney, but in her own sovereign right? What is to be done with this money. Shall it be paid to these insurance companies, that have already made money out of this business? Sir, I trust not.

There is a species of property that requires the peculiar guardianship of nations. It is the maritime property; it is that class of property which contributes so largely to the wealth of nations, and which by reason of its very character is so utterly powerless to protect itself. It is regarded all over Christendom as being a species of property that is the object of the peculiar care of nations. Therefore I conclude that it is a class of property which ought to be protected by the United States out of this indemnity fund; and the owners of this property who were not insured should be paid their losses out of it. The losers of that class of property destroyed on the high seas by these confederate cruisers and those who were compelled to pay war risks in my judgment are among those to whom compensation should be paid. So far as the loss of property is concerned I can see no kind of difference in principle between depredations that were committed by the Shenandoah after Melbourne and those committed by the Shenandoah before Melbourne. Nor can I see any difference in point of principle, if you dispose of this money in this way, between that class of losses that were incurred by reason of cruisers escaping from English ports and any other kind of cruiser that got abroad upon the high seas and destroyed this kind of property.

But when you talk about giving any part of this money to insurance companies that made it a business to take risks upon this kind of property under these circumstances and made the premiums such that they have made money instead of suffering loss, I can see no semblance of justice or equity in it.

The demand of these companies is not based upon any broad comprehensive principle of a nation compensating its citizens for an actual loss sustained, but upon dry technical precedents of subrogation as between individuals. It is not wronging them to withhold that which does not relieve them from losses, for they have not sustained any; while if their demands are granted it adds to their gains, and wrongs those whose claims in my judgment are of a highly meritorious character.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, in the remarks I intend to make in relation to the moneys awarded by the arbitration at Geneva and paid by Great Britain to the United States, I do not wish it to be understood that I suppose I am fully or even approximating a full presentation of the case, much less that what I shall say is the full argument in support of the conclusions to which I have come. I shall only try in the brief time allowed me to state as well as I may be able some of the considerations that control my own judgment in recommending that the moneys be permanently covered into the Treasury of the United States. And now, what is the case? The United States was at war with the so-called Confederate States. Great Britain was a neutral nation, at peace with the United States and with the confederates. It is immaterial whether the belligerency of the confederates was hastily, anxiously, and inconsiderately acknowledged by Great Britain or not. A public war was raging between the United States and a portion of her people. The confederates were straining every nerve and making every effort in their power to equip, man, and put upon the seas war-vessels for the purpose of crippling and destroying our commerce. They were anxious to build, purchase, and obtain such vessels at almost any price and at any hazard. It mattered little to them with whom they dealt, with whom they intrigued, or from whom they procured their ships of war. With the confederates and the United States it was an open, public war on land and on sea. It was a declared public war as between nations, involving the parties and subjecting the citizens of each party to all the consequences of national warfare precisely the same as though the two contending parties had never been of the same nation.

In this state and condition of affairs, under the laws of nations and the laws of war, the confederates, as one of the contending parties engaged in war, for the purpose of crippling her enemy, had a right under such laws to prey upon our commerce, to seize our merchant-vessels and dispose of them and their cargoes as lawful prize of war. They were availing themselves of these war rights as far as they were able when Great Britain commenced to violate her obligations of neutrality toward the United States. Up to this point whatever of destruction of individual property, whatever of injury or wrong was done to individuals, whether on land or on sea, was to be borne and suffered as the natural fate and result of war. The only obligation resting upon the United States was to the utmost of its ability, by all the means in its power, to protect its citizens from the natural consequences of war. Thus far as between the United States and the Confederate States and the citizens of the United States there was no obligation upon the United States to indemnify any of its citizens for losses sustained in the common struggle. It was a conflict between nations at war, wherein the individuals composing the nations were subject to all the dangers and vicissitudes of actual war, and entitled to no indemnification for whatever one might suffer over another. If one was destroyed in person or property while another escaped, it was only to be attributed to the fate and fortune of war.

And here and now commences the wrong of Great Britain. What did she do? What is the complaint against her? What is her wrong? I know it has been claimed or charged that some of the confederate cruisers were manned by British seamen. However this may have been, it is not the ground of complaint as admitted in the treaty under which the Geneva arbitration was agreed upon. And if it were the case, the men were enlisted into the confederate service and were for the purposes of the war confederates, entitled to the consideration of confederates, and in all cases to be treated as such. The vessels, all the cruisers fitted out in British ports of which complaint was made, were unquestionably the vessels and property of the confederates. Upon this point it is immaterial where or how the vessels were obtained or from whom or by whom manned. In the hands and control of the confederates they were in the hands and control of a nation at war with the United States and subject and entitled to the laws of war. Let it be remembered that the wrong charged upon Great Britain was not that the cruisers were hers, or the men by whom they were manned her subjects. Great Britain's wrong was that, being at peace with the United States while the United States was at war with the Confederate States, she neglected her duty as a neutral nation and wrongfully permitted confederate cruisers to be fitted out in and escape from her ports, whereby the confederates were enabled more effectually to prey upon our commerce and injure and destroy our merchants and merchant-vessels. It was not that Great Britain herself, by her own hands, did any of these things, but that she gave aid and comfort to those with whom the United States was at war.

It was not, the complaint was not, that the losses of the citizens of the United States were greater or more extensive, though this as a consequence was argued and was in all human probability the case; but the direct wrong—the wrong directly charged upon her and which was under the newly prescribed rules and laws of nations established and admitted as found by the arbitration—was the negligently and wrongfully allowing the confederates to fit out cruisers in her ports, designed to, and which did in fact, injure the commerce and citizens of the United States. It was not charged, it cannot be said now that Great Britain destroyed any vessel of the United States or of that of any of its citizens. Her act of which complaint was made was as distinct from the act of the confederate cruisers in destroying our commerce and vessels as that of the manufacturer of burglars' tools or the landlord who rented him his shop in which to make them and the burglar in breaking a bank. Both are wrongful acts; both are crimes in the eye of the law; both should be punished; both should be atoned for; but they are not the same acts. The manufacturer of the tools is certainly not responsible for all the burglar may do with them. The individual upon whom he trespasses cannot recover—has no legal right as against the manufacturer—even if the tools were used in committing the trespass. The wrongful act of the manufacturer is in making the tools and delivering them to the burglar. All the burglar thereafter does is his own act and all the consequences attributable to him alone. It must be conceded, therefore, that the wrong of Great Britain was in opening her ports as she did to the use of the confederates. That was a wrong of Great Britain as a nation against the United States as a nation, to be answered and atoned for by the one nation to the other. It was for this wrong, it was for this injury, complaint was made against her and indemnity demanded of her. It was in satisfaction of this wrong, in indemnity for this injury, the award was made and the $15,500,000 paid by Great Britain to the United States. No individual, no citizen of the United States, whether he lived upon the land or the sea, had any individual right in or claim upon Great Britain or this fund. It was, I repeat, an indemnity for national injury, made in satisfaction of a claim preferred by one nation upon another. It was not a legal liability created and established either by the law of nations or by any municipal law. There was in fact, at the time of the commission of the alleged wrong by Great Britain, neither law nor treaty in existence obliging or requiring the payment of that or any other sum therefor.

Indeed it is not certain if any liability of Great Britain to the United States under the then existing law or any treaty could have been established, or if any would have been conceded, except for the new rules prescribed in and by the treaty under which the award was made—specially prescribed and established for the very case. And it may be an incident of some interest to the future historian to determine whether Great Britain did not consent to pay the $15,500,000 awarded as the consideration and for the purpose of procuring these new rules of international law. It may be that instead of her paying us an indemnity for great wrongs done us in aiding the confederates in destroying our merchantmen and shipping, and driving American commerce from the seas, it will turn out that she has only paid us a very small sum for a very great commercial advantage. We may be thankful indeed if by these new rules we have not given to Great Britain permanent supremacy of the seas. She can well afford to pay fifteen or twenty millions once in ten or twenty years for the monopoly of the carrying trade. Her increased profits have undoubtedly been many times the sum awarded at Geneva already. And how long it will be before our commerce will recover from the check given it time alone can determine. That it will be many years we already know, and considering the sum paid as an indemnity it is contemptible.

And now, after all, it is claimed that the money belongs to individuals. It is claimed that certain insurance companies, underwriters who insured certain vessels that were destroyed by certain confederate cruisers during the war, are entitled to the value of all such vessels out of this fund. It is admitted on their behalf that they paid on account of vessels so destroyed and insured by them the sum of $5,000,000, and that they received for such insurance in increased war-premiums not less than $10,000,000, thus making $5,000,000 in clear profits. And now they by their attorneys are here modestly insisting they should have paid them another five millions out of this award to add to their enormous profits. The bare statement of this demand, in view of the profits admitted, should it would seem cause hesitation and require the strongest and most resistless reasons in its support before any just mind could consent to it. The calamity of war was upon us; the whole land was drenched in blood; properties were being destroyed, and fortunes—the accumulations of years of toil and trial—were swept away; the rich all over the land were made poor; farms and plantations devastated as with the besom of destruction, and all without hope of reparation or indemnity; and yet these insurance companies are clamoring for another 100 per cent. of profit! They insist that at the time they insured these vessels that were destroyed by the confederate cruisers it was a part of the contract of insurance that, in addition to the enhanced war premiums paid by the insured, they were in case of loss and payment by them to have a claim against Great Britain for indemnity. They insist that they filed their claims in that view with the Secretary of State, and that they were presented and considered by the arbitrators in making up the award. They claim, in fact, that the treaty was almost if not altogether in their interest, and that this greatest international tribunal of the world was solely to settle individual private claims.

The United States, it is said, was in all it did in the matter only acting as the attorney or agent of these insurance companies and some few other private individual claimants, and that it now holds the moneys of the award as their trustee. To us this seems a very narrow and technical view of this great international proceeding. It is belittling that exalted tribunal, and bringing the high contracting parties and those connected with it into contempt. But let us see: It is said the doctrine of subrogation applies, that insurance companies, having paid for the loss of the vessel, are entitled by law to be subrogated to the rights of the owner. In our view the owners themselves never had and never could have had any rights to which the insurers could or ought to be subrogated. It is only legal rights to which the doctrine of subrogation applies. The vessels were destroyed by the confederates with whom we were at war, and the destruction was an act of war, for which there is no legal right of recovery. The destruction was not the act of Great Britain. Her wrong, as already stated, was in allowing the confederates the use of her ports. The rule by which she was finally convicted of this wrong was not in existence at the time the vessels were destroyed. How, then, can it be contended that the owners had or might have had a legal right as against Great Britain? It makes no difference that she subsequently consented that the damage resulting to the United States from her wrong might be measured by the value of vessels destroyed by the confederates. Such subsequent consent or agreement did not and could not create a legal right in favor of the owners. The claim of a legal right in favor of the owners against Great Britain for the destruction of vessels by the confederates is too remote. Who can say the vessels would not have been destroyed if the wrong of Great Britain had not been committed?

Who can say, to whom on earth is it given to know, but that confederate cruisers would have destroyed the same vessels if they had not been permitted the use of British ports at all? And whether so or not, would the unfriendliness, the bad intention, the wrong of Great Britain toward the United States have been any the less? Would the violation of neutral duty and obligation have been any the less real, or the right of the United States to demand atonement and reparation for her breach of duty any the less complete? It seems to me clear beyond doubt that when Great Britain had permitted the use of her ports to the confederates and carelessly or negligently permitted them to go forth on their errand of plunder and destruction, her liability was fixed, and the right of the United States to demand indemnity complete.

Great Britain did not commit the act of destruction nor did she command it to be done. Her wrongful act was solely in allowing the confederates, as against the United States, the improper use of her ports. It was in that and not in what the confederates did with the cruisers after their escape. If her wrongful act had been against an individual instead of the United States, no recovery could be had by the individual on account of the acts of the confederates in the destruction of the vessels. The law would answer such a demand that it was not the act of Great Britain; that it was too remote to create a legal liability or a legal right against her. The destruction was not a necessary or even natural consequence of letting the cruisers depart her ports. Hence it was that new rules were devised and agreed to, by which the sum was to be found due and payable by the arbitration.

The treaty in all its recitations and expressions confirms the view that the sum allowed by the arbitrators, however it was arrived at or made up, was a national allowance for national wrong. Let it not be forgotten that the Johnson-Clarendon treaty was rejected for the very reason that it only provided for the adjustment of individual claims.

The treaty under which the award was made recites:

The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty being desirous to provide an amicable settlement of all causes of difference between the countries; and whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty.

And also—

Now in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States.

Thus the treaty itself provides in express terms for differences that have arisen between the two governments. It was to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States. It does not alter the case that the United States advertised for the presentation of individual claims for losses on behalf of its citizens, and that such were presented and considered by the arbitrators. If the wrong of Great Britain was to be atoned for in damages and the United States compensated in money, it was necessary that the United States in some way should show the nature and extent of its injury. The sum allowed was clearly not the aggregate sum of all the claims presented. Nor can any mortal man now determine what claims or what percentage of any claim formed the basis of the final award. That none were specifically recognized, adjudicated, or allowed in the determination is certain. And it is not pretended by any one that the consideration of the claims presented, in so far as they were considered in making up the sum allowed, precludes the parties having like claims not presented at all. Mr. Evarts, one of the counsel for the insurance companies, on being interrogated by members of the Judiciary Committee, admitted that it would undoubtedly be the duty of the Government to pay out of the fund any other "clear direct loss not presented or considered" by the arbitrators; that there was no advantage gained or merit in the presentation of the claim at Geneva. How after this it can be contended that the sum awarded was for the payment of specific claims, or that the sum allowed was computed solely upon claims presented, I leave for him to elucidate. But he with the other representatives of the United States at Geneva was expressly instructed through Mr. Secretary Fish that—

The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two Governments, and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross. * * * * *

The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the cases. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by the Government, without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such committal will be avoided in the arguments of counsel.

Thus the sum awarded was a sum in gross. The subject was considered and discussed as one between the two governments. No committal was made in favor of individual claims or of any class or description of claims. And as far as any use was made of the claims presented it was as a mere measurement of values or losses of the Government.

What now becomes of the "trust" in favor of particular claimants? The Government of the United States declined to present or urge any claims for payment specifically or to be by its representatives committed to the payment of any such claims. This determination and instruction of the Government were made known to the arbitrators before the award was made, and the award was accordingly a sum in gross made, expressly so made, to indemnify the United States for wrongs suffered at the hands of Great Britain. This, and that the unpresented claims, claims never before the arbitrators at all, are admitted to be entitled equally with those presented and considered, settles the question against the pretense that the award was based upon and for the payment of specific claims, or that any trust exists therein in favor of particular claimants. The truth is, I repeat it, there were no specific claims ascertained, considered, settled, and adjudicated by the arbitration. The only use made of such claims as were presented was to measure or approximate the national damage from Great Britain's wrong. They were used to determine her liability upon a basis and under rules then and there fixed and agreed upon. There was no creation of a fund in which the owners of lost vessels had or might have had any legal right, and consequently there were no legal rights to which insurance companies could be subrogated. Upon what principle of right or justice, if the United States was acting as the agent or attorney of private claimants in representing them before this tribunal, could she withdraw or surrender the claims of one class to procure the payment or allowance of the other? Upon no other we confidently assert could she have done as she did, than that the United States as a nation was dealing with Great Britain as a nation in reference to national concerns.

The war-premium claimants urge their claims upon entirely distinct and different grounds. They deny altogether the claims and rights of the insurance companies.

Mr. George M. Moore, who appeared before the Judiciary Committee and made by far the ablest and most plausible presentation of their case, in his printed argument filed with the committee, says:

There has been much discussion in regard to claims of insurance companies and the claim for war premiums. The amount represented by these claims is large, and they are directly antagonistic; if either be allowed, the other must be rejected.

If this be true, and it was not denied, it precludes the idea, if the Government were disposed, of the payment of both these classes. And so far as the war-premium claimants are concerned they make no claim on the ground of the award being a trust fund. They do not claim payment as a legal right, but as an act of justice and equity. They do not even claim that their losses were taken into account in making up the award.

Mr. Moore, in his argument, takes the position that—

The indemnity paid by Great Britain was for the value of the property destroyed not for any particular class or classes of claims, leaving the United States free in the exercise of its sovereign will, to provide for its equitable distribution.

It thus appears that the claimants on account of war premiums paid do not place their right to the fund upon any committal of the United States or of Great Britain to any class or specific claim or upon any action of the arbitrators or recognition of them in the making up of the award. They allege that the money belongs to the United States, and while claiming it was awarded for the value of property destroyed, yet that the Government is "free to dispose of it in its own sovereign will." It is only upon an equitable distribution that they claim or expect to be paid.

The bills of the Senate and the House for the distribution of the fund are necessarily founded upon the principle that the money is absolutely and unconditionally the money of the United States. The House bill by its title is "A bill to provide for the just and equitable distribution of the award made to the United States by the commissioners at Geneva under the treaty of Washington." The title of the Senate bill is "for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition" thereof.

The majority of the Judiciary Committee in their report, after an elaborate statement of the nature, origin, and presentation of the private claims and the action of the United States Government and the government of Great Britain and the decision of the arbitrators, conclude as follows:

Upon this statement of the origin and presentation of the claims, if your committee are correct in their views of international law, it is difficult to see wherein any private person can have any right, legal or equitable, to any distinct portion of this fund.

The citizen, undoubtedly, has the moral right to ask of his Government reparation for his loss so suffered, but he has no more right to have it paid from this fund than from any other source of indemnity within the power of his Government.

And further on, and more explicitly, the majority report as follows:

Your committee therefore have approached the subject of indemnification for losses of our citizens, by the acts of cruisers, in the firm belief that this money is the money of the United States, free from all legal or equitable claims of any person whatever, to be dealt with by the Government according to its own views of the claims of its citizens upon itself, and the moral duty to afford such relief as may seem just.

In the first paragraph of the report the committee say:

The first question which presents itself in considering the matters above referred to your committee, and which must underlie all action to be taken in regard to them, is, Whose money is this fund derived from the arbitrament at Geneva?

It would seem that the foregoing quotations from the report of the majority was a pretty clear and explicit answer to the question, "Whose money is this fund derived from the arbitrament at Geneva?" I agree to the proposition of the committee that it is "the money of the United States," free and clear as any other money in the Treasury from any legal or equitable claims of any person whatever.

I have come to this conclusion not, I confess, without hesitation and doubt. Out of deference to my colleagues on the committee I have considered and reconsidered the questions involved, each time reaching the same conclusion. After carefully reading and studying the reports of both the majority and minority of the committee, I am confirmed in the opinion that this money ought to be covered into the Treasury. Both the majority and the minority are of the same opinion with reference to portions of the fund not necessary to pay the claims they respectively champion. The majority report that—

It is believed by your committee, when all the claims are paid, with interest, there will still remain a very considerable balance to go into the Treasury of the United States.

This of course means all the claims provided for in the bill from the Judiciary Committee, and does not include the claims for losses paid by insurance companies.

The minority of the committee in their report say:

But it seems to us to be gross and flagrant injustice for Congress to seek to determine this question, and determine it erroneously as proposed in this bill; for, so far as this fund is not to be distributed to the parties interested in the ships and cargoes destroyed by the cruisers for which Great Britain was held liable, we agree with our colleague, Mr. ELDREDGE, that it should be covered into the Treasury.

The committee is therefore nearly equally divided, both agreeing with me that instead of paying the claims the others recommend, the money, or so much thereof, ought to be covered into the Treasury. I feel therefore that by the judgment and consideration of all the committee I am in part right; at all events not, in their opinion, altogether wrong.

And here is suggested a pertinent and most important question for the consideration of both branches of the committee and those who agree with them, respectively: How it is that they should agree that any portion and not the whole of this fund ought to be covered finally into the Treasury? If this fund was predicated upon private, individual claims and belongs of right to such individuals and not to the United States, how can it be that there should remain any sum to be covered into the Trasury? How is it that there is not a claimant for his exact share, proportion, or percentage of the fund! If the fund was based upon actual claims, considered and adjudicated claims, the dollars of the fund and the dollars demanded should exactly correspond. There should be no discrepancy between them.

Mr. Speaker, in expressing my convictions that this fund should go into the Treasury of the United States as the money of the Government, of the whole people, I do not wish to be understood as saying there are none of those losses that the Government ought to pay. I think justice perhaps requires that some of them should be paid by the Government, and this, too, without regard to the Geneva award. The majority of the committee, as I understand their report, say that claimants have no more right to indemnity out of this fund than out of any other resource of the Government. Why, then, should not this money go into the Treasury? Clearly, if it be not a fund legally set apart for a particular or specific purpose, it belongs to and should go into the general fund of the Government.

No one denies that this award was paid as an indemnity for the wrongs of Great Britain—an indemnity for injuries done, for losses sustained. It was an indemnity paid by a neutral nation for wrongs done to this nation or its citizens and for losses sustained by the nation or its citizens during the war. If it were to be distributed for losses sustained upon principles of high equity and justice, it should be given to no one who did not suffer loss—loss by the war. The insurance companies, then, of all others, would be least entitled. The war, though a harvest of blood to the great body of the people, was a harvest of plenty and wealth to them. While the mass of the people were suffering all the horrors and calamities of war; while whole fortunes were destroyed and vast accumulations swept away; while gaunt poverty and even hunger were brought to the doors of the once proud and oppulent, and thousands made to cry for the necessaries of life, these men and corporations were making money, adding vast accumulations to their wealth, and dividing among themselves two dollars for one of their investments. To ask more, to ask now that the Government should divide this award among them, only demonstrates the cheek and sordid selfishness of avarice. And are we to be told that it is a flagrant breach of the national faith not at once to hand this money over to the only class of men who were made rich by the casualties of war and the circumstances growing out of the very wrong for which the indemnity was paid? And what superior equity is there in the claim for payment on account of war premiums paid? If the vessel insured, for which war premiums was paid, was lost or destroyed, then the insured obtained the full benefit of the contract he made. He got all his bargain was for. True, he paid more for what he got than if there had been no war. But who did not pay an increased price for everything purchased and used during the war? As well might a claim be urged on the ground of high equity for the increased salaries paid the men and officers with whom the ships were manned. Men were scarce and wages were high, caused by the war and perhaps by the increased danger from the confederate cruisers, and why should not every man who paid higher wages be paid the difference upon the principle of high equity?

And how is it with the cargo, the merchandise for the insurance of which war premiums were paid? If the cargo were lost, the cost price, the interest thereon, the freight and profits, were all paid by the insurer as the consideration for the war premiums paid. If the cargo escaped, reached its place of destination, and was finally sold, all those things were charged up and included in the price of sale. The insurer of the cargo in that case was not the loser, but the loss fell upon the consumer of the goods—upon the people, the masses, who were obliged to use the goods. In all such cases the war premiums were reimbursed to the merchant in the increased cost to the consumer. Would not the "high equity" which the majority invoke require that the increased cost to the consumer should be repaid him? Is not he the real loser? If any one has a claim for indemnity, is it not the one who suffered? And is not the real sufferer the one who paid the price of the goods for consumption, enhanced as it was by all these considerations? None of us have forgotten the war prices exacted for everything upon which the people had to live. The money awarded comes from Great Britain, whose wrong was against the United States, and the losses from which the whole people of the United States suffered; and what now would more completely and justly satisfy the demands, the exalted demands of high equity, than to cover the money into the people's Treasury for the people's use?

I do not appreciate the force of the argument that the moneys of the award should be paid to the war-premium claimants because of the competition they were forced to encounter in the superior inducements or advantages of shipping goods in British bottoms. This certainly was one of the natural incidents of war and would always occur when the United States was at war with any nation upon the sea. It is one of the evils of war against which no nation is obliged to indemnify its citizens. As well might the western farmer or the southern planter demand indemnity for the increased cost of production caused by war and their difficulties therefrom in competing with the farmers and planters of nations at peace. Such things are the common sufferings and misfortunes of war, against which there can be no indemnity. Nor can I see that there is anything in the suggestion of the superior obligation of the nation to water-borne property. It requires a pretty keen sense to comprehend the application of any such principle to war premiums paid for insurance. I am not aware of any legal or other national obligation to indemnify the owners of water-borne property destroyed by war. There is no distinction in this respect between property on sea and on land. And here again, let it be observed, is another reason why this money should go permanently into the Treasury.

Aside from the individual loss to the owners of ships and vessels engaged in the commerce of the country, there is, there can be no greater injury or loss to the nation than the loss of its commerce. The injury of Great Britain did not end with her wrongfully opening her ports to the confederates. But taking advantage of her own wrong, availing herself of the exposed and dangerous condition of our commerce, she went to work by intrigue and every means in her power, by working upon the fears and conniving with the owners of American vessels, to have them transferred to her and placed under her flag. This was a national loss, and is another reason why this money should be placed where, as far as it will go, it will be an indemnity to the real losers, the whole people, all of whom suffered and still suffer from the destruction of national commerce.

Mr. Speaker, it is said there are individual losers not included in the underwriters or the war-premium claimants whose claims are meritorious and ought to be paid. If this be so, and I do not deny it, there are not many of them and they are not large. Let these come to Congress with their claim as other claimants are obliged to come, present them fairly and truthfully, and let Congress judge them justly and liberally. Let them come relying upon the just sense of the Republic, and when they come let them not be indifferently turned away. I am not for repudiation of any just obligation of the Government. I would pay every just demand to the utmost farthing, and this, too, without reference to the Geneva award. I would pay every loss that can be distinguished from those losses incident to war and which must be borne by the loser as one of the misfortunes of war—every loss which a just, upright, liberal, and generous government ought to pay to its citizens. But there is no reason or propriety because this money was paid as an indemnity for the losses sustained in war that it should be thrown away or bestowed upon those who have sustained no losses and who are no more entitled to it than every other citizen of the United States. There is no more sense or propriety in the establishment of a cumbersome and expensive commission, court, or other tribunal charged with the duty of disbursing this particular fund of the United States, whether justly due or not, than the appointment of such a tribunal to set in judgment upon all the moneys of the Government in the Treasury.

I am not frightened with the threat of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] that if the insurance companies are not paid now they will continue to haunt Congress and press their demands till some future Congress will yield to their clamor and power; nor do I bow to that other menace of the other gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] who tells us Congress "dare not refuse" these insurance claimants. This has been their clamor and these their tactics from the beginning, and they have not as yet browbeat a report from either House of Congress in their favor. They should have some better and juster force than arrogance with which to persuade Congress. Let them show that they have been losers, sufferers beyond the great mass of the citizens of the United States in the mighty conflict through which the nation passed. The war was a great calamity. It covered this whole nation with a pall. It sent death and mourning to almost every fireside, and caused suffering and loss to almost every citizen. Some suffered more than others; none escaped entirely. Offend not the sense of patriotism and justice of the Republic by bestowing this indemnity for the nation's injury upon brazen and sorded claimants to whom the calamity of war brought no loss, but who grew rich in the midst of the nation's agony.

This money was paid to the United States by Great Britain, the leading nation of the world, in acknowledgment of the wrong inflicted upon us as a nation in the dark hours of national suffering and trial, and is valuable not so much on account of the sum as an acknowledgment that the Republic cannot be trifled with, even when sorely tried and oppressed by the greatest nation, without being held responsible.

If I have any time remaining, I yield it to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are eight minutes of the gentleman's hour remaining.

[Mr. KELLOGG addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take any active part in the discussion which is now proceeding before the House, but the attack made by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] when he found it impossible in the English language to find any word to characterize my conduct because I was with the majority of the committee in this matter, and the attack made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] that I had violated good faith and put in a proposition here to strike out mutual insurance companies, rendered it absolutely necessary for me in my own defense, if for nothing else, to occupy the time of the House for a few moments. Had I intended to have made a speech I would have followed the example of those distinguished gentlemen and prepared with care a written speech, because the dignity and importance of the subject justifies that degree of preparation and does not justify a speech made as I propose to make mine.

Why, sir, I went home last night and undertook to prepare something for a speech with the thermometer at 95. I commenced by looking up mutual insurance companies' statistics, and before I looked them up for half an hour I thought of nothing under the sun but fire insurance companies, and gave it up.

Now, sir, this is a fight of insurance companies, mainly of New York, against the people of the country, and nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. TREMAIN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TREMAIN. Are you not aware about $700,000 goes to stock companies in Boston, and that, if collected, it will be handed over to the losers by the Boston fire?

Mr. FRYE. O, Mr. Speaker, what an arrant humbug is this! I heard the gentleman from New York in the interest of insurance companies talking that in the House and privately elsewhere, that if these Boston insurance companies got this money they would pay it to the men who lost in that fire. I say to the gentleman many of these insurance companies for the last fifteen years have been making 15, 20, and 30 per cent. a year, and dividing it out among their stockholders, giving up their reserve for the purpose of paying dividends, and then when the fire came had little or nothing to pay to their policy-holders. And that is the history of the majority of the insurance companies in all great fires.

Mr. MYERS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. FRYE. I do not yield any further. I have been cut down half an hour already. I say, sir, that it is a fight between the insurance companies and the people. And because I take the side of the people as I believe, of the men who suffered in the war, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] cannot characterize my conduct, because the English language fails to supply him with words to do it justice.

Why, sir, when this war broke out we had engaged in foreign commerce vessels of two million six hundred thousand tonnage; we were within six or eight hundred thousand of the tonnage of Great Britain, increasing at the ratio of 60 per cent. every ten years. If we had gone on at least five years longer we would have been mistress of the seas, and Great Britain knew it. Great Britain saw this conflict come on, and immediately in the month of May—the 15th, I think—acknowledged the belligerent rights of the South before they had a single white-winged sail upon the seas. And immediately the Sumter escaped from the Mississippi and in one month was supplied at a British port. And when we made complaint Great Britain turned round and said, she is a man-of-war entitled to the rights of a man-of-war. And the Georgia fitted out in English ports, and the Shenandoah fitted out in English ports, manned with English seamen, coaled with English coal, and armed with English guns, commenced to prey upon our commerce. And at the close of the war we had a little over a million of tonnage left.

Now, sir, instead of this great nation of ours making complaint against Great Britain for the violation of all decency and propriety for her own selfish purposes—instead of her doing that, what does the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] say she did? He says that she became a claim agent in behalf of the New York and Boston insurance companies. That is the position taken by all these insurance gentlemen. There was no great national wrong to be righted; but the insurance companies had claims which were to be collected, and forsooth this great country of ours was at once converted into an insurance agent to collect those claims—without even a contingent fee, as the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] beside me suggests, and liable to pay costs if she failed.

Now, look at it a moment, Mr. Speaker. The insurance companies send their agents to the city of Washington. Suppose every loss were an insured loss, the amount was $10,000,000. The insurance agents come to Washington and they say to their great Government, "This great war has been going on; we have lost $10,000,000; we call upon you to protect us in our rights and to recover from Great Britain that $10,000,000." What says the Government? "Did you actually lose $10,000,000?" "O, no; the people down in Massachusetts and in Maine and in Florida, and all along the coast, the poor men, the owners of ships, the owners of cargoes, paid us $20,000,000. But, nevertheless, notwithstanding we made the $10,000,000, we ask of you as a paternal Government to demand of Great Britain that that $10,000,000 shall be paid us. And if they refuse to pay the demand, then you should go to war and collect it." What would the Government have done? Would they not have laughed them to scorn at once? Go to war as an agent for insurance companies that had doubled their money during the war, and had done it out of the men who had suffered and are still suffering! Go to war to collect those claims for these insurance companies that had grown rich by the million during the war! Suppose the Government had gone to war and had spent $1,000,000,000 and lost a hundred thousand lives, could the Government justify itself in having done so as the agent of insurance companies? And yet, according to the doctrine of the gentleman from New York, that is all under the sun the Government was engaged in.

These insurance companies I admit are powerful. I admit that they have millions of dollars aggregated in the hands to-day of a very few men; I admit that they have agents in every town and city in this broad country; I admit that they have lawyers in every city in the country; I admit that they stand there an overshadowing power, and I think their power is felt here in this House itself every day; I believe that in the hotels of Washington and all around here that power is being felt to-day. Why it was sufficiently strong to make itself felt even at Geneva, where the tribunal assembled to settle these claims. It had power to take the most distinguished lawyer in this country, one of the Government counsel before the Geneva tribunal, make him forget the dignity of his position, and to send him back here on the floor of this House as a lobbyist. The leading lawyer, as the gentleman says, of the great city of New York, coming as counsel from Geneva into this House as lobbyist for insurance companies! Ah! that was an almighty power almost that could make the gentleman stoop to that.

Mr. TREMAIN. Will the gentleman answer me a question? What authority has he for saying that when Mr. Evarts was counsel at Geneva he was counsel for any one of these claimants who now present their demands?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Because he said so before the Committee on the Judiciary of the last House of Representatives.

Mr. TREMAIN. On the contrary, there was a letter in the House written by him yesterday denying that in toto.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And he was on this floor and I put it to him to his face and he did not dare deny it.

Mr. KELLOGG. He could not deny it here. You had the advantage of him, and would have refused to let him do it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; I should not have refused. I do not do that kind of thing; I do not come from Connecticut.

Mr. WOODFORD. As a grandson of Connecticut I am grateful.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And so am I.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, fearing this very power, Mr. Fish, the Secretary of State, caused what will now be read to be sent to the Geneva tribunal and to our counsel there.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two governments, and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross. In the discussion of this question, and in the treatment of the entire case, you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded, or what may be recovered, in the event of the appointment of the board of assessors mentioned in the tenth article of the treaty. It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers, upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such committal be avoided in the arguments of counsel.

Mr. FRYE. Reserving the question to itself what should be done as to the insurance; reserving to the Congress of the United States the question what should be done as to the insurers. Curious agent of the insurance companies was not the Government? If it had been the agent of the insurance companies would they not have repudiated it when it announced a doctrine like that? Now, Mr. Evarts was inquired of in the room of the Judiciary Committee in this manner: "Mr. Evarts, you claim that the Government was the agent of the insurance companies and holds this money to-day in trust for them; suppose there was an insurance company which had met losses, but which by mistake was not represented at Geneva; what would you do with that company?" "Why, pay them, of course." "Pay them, Mr. Evarts; with what?" "Why, with the money that this agent had collected for its other clients." Where did it get its right, if this agency existed, to take those contributions from its clients who had appeared and pay them over to persons who had not appeared? We hold as a committee that the Government of the United States was righting a great national wrong; that in righting that great national wrong Great Britain was to be punished; she was to apologize; she was to establish certain principles of international law; she was to pay certain moneys. The proof was before the tribunal of all losses which had been suffered and an award was made in gross, and the committee hold that having been made it is to-day in the hands of the Government to be disposed of—to whom? Why, to the losers, and to the losers only. To be disposed of to insurance companies who doubled their money in the war? No; but to the men who lost their money by the depredations of these cruisers. And we do not limit it to losses occasioned by the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah. Why should we? The Shenandoah never was in an American port; she sailed from an English port; she was built in an English port; she was manned by English sailors; and why should not a portion of this money be paid for her depredations? So with the Georgia and so with the Sumter. The committee provides that losses caused by all of these cruisers shall be paid regardless of the fact whether they were included in the Geneva award or not. They provide that the owner of the Delphine shall be paid, because when the rebel cruiser that had destroyed his vessel went into an English port he started at once to libel that vessel in the English courts, and he would have libeled her and compelled her to pay for the loss of his ship but he found when he got there that our minister, Mr. Adams, had taken possession of her and sold her for what was equivalent to $400,000, and you have got that $400,000 in your Treasury to-day; and yet she is not to be paid for, according to the gentleman from New York, because, forsooth, that vessel was destroyed a few days before the Shenandoah sailed into Melbourne. We hold that no such distinction should be made, but that this citizen of Ohio should be paid for his ship which was lost.

Mr. Speaker, I should have been very glad when I found that I had to speak upon this question at all to have taken my whole hour, because now I am cramped for time and am obliged to proceed without method, and I must ask the House to bear with me in doing so. I have offered an amendment to the bill, and that is to strike out the mutual insurance companies. The bill provides that they shall be paid, wherever they lost, every loss which they suffered by reason of these cruisers, and that they should pay it to those who contributed to pay the losses. How does it come that that provision was put in the bill? Why the insurance men and gentlemen of the committee asserted that these mutual insurance companies were simply associations of gentlemen guaranteeing each other against loss, giving premium notes, and then at the end of the year, when the business had been adjusted, if there were no losses, getting those premium notes back less the expenses, and if they had lost, getting them back less what they had lost.

That being the true statement of the case, we might just as well pay them as mutual insurance companies as to pay them as war-premium claimants, because in either event they would get what they had lost.

Now, sir, what is the fact? There is no such company as that in the State of New York, nor one that bears the slightest resemblance to it. The only ones I know of are in New Bedford, and the agent of the New Bedford companies is here to-day making no claim whatever on this fund. They say they have no right to it; that the men who paid the war premiums to them are the men entitled to it. They are the only strictly mutual insurance companies that I know of interested in this matter.

Now take the great insurance company of New York which comes nearer a mutual than any other, and that is the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company. Let me give you a few statistics of that company taken from the New York insurance report. The Atlantic Mutual was organized in 1842. In January, 1861, its total assets were $6,646,292.10; profits for the year 1860, $1,574,000. Now, where did she get her $6,600,000 assets if she was conducting her business on any such principle as the gentleman talked about in committee? Why was not the $6,000,000 divided up to the men who gave their premium notes? Again: "6 per cent. interest on the outstanding certificates will be paid to the holders thereof on and after the 5th day of February, 1861. After reserving $2,500,000 of profits the outstanding certificates of 1859 will be paid to the holders thereof." The profits of one year, after reserving $2,500,000 of it, to be divided among mutual stockholders! O, what a mutuality there was about that!

Again, for the year 1862 40 per cent. free of Government tax was declared as a dividend. Again, in 1864: total amount of assets January 1, 1864, was $9,265,545; net earnings, $5,268,670; profits for the year 1863, right in the midst of that terrible war, were $2,630,000. "After reserving $3,500,000 of profits, certificates of issue for 1862 will be paid." Reserving $3,500,000 again of the profits of 1863; there you have two years of the war, with over $6,000,000 of the profits reserved. Reserved for whom? Reserved from suffering men who were paying extortionate war premiums. That was where they were getting their money. Paid out to whom? O, to this honest, lovely, mutual association of gentlemen who met together to assure each other's property and guarantee each other against loss.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And who have presented a claim of nearly $2,000,000 in this matter.

Mr. FRYE. Yes; who have a claim of $1,780,000 which they are here now trying to get us to add to the reserve fund of that company. And the reserve fund of that company to-day amounts to between twelve and fifteen million dollars. Where do they get it from, and to whom does it belong? They settle up every year with the members of the company; they issue to them scrip. When the scrip is paid, then to whom does this $15,000,000 of reserve belong? It belongs to the company. Who is the company? Who knows who the company is? Where is it to be found? How is this to be divided?

Mr. BASS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. BASS. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the profit of which he speaks is represented under the laws of the State of New York by scrip in small amounts issued to each of the persons who have received policies from the insurance companies, that scrip representing the amount of annual profit which the company is supposed to make upon the basis of which he speaks, and which scrip is redeemable only at the pleasure of the company, being compelled by the statute of the State to keep a reserve for extraordinary losses?

Mr. FRYE. I know that that is not so; I know that it is invested in United States bonds, &c.

Mr. BASS. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. And in mortgages and stocks of all kinds. That scrip is over and beyond the reserve of $3,500,000. And I know this further—I am glad the gentleman reminded me of it—I know that the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company by virtue of its charter is controlled by a board of directors, and that the policy-holders of that company cannot under the law in any way go behind the action of those directors; that those directors meet together at the end of the year and if there has been 50 per cent. of profit they have the power to declare a dividend of 25 per cent. and no more, and no policy holder has any power in the premises or can prevent the acts of those directors.

Mr. MYERS. My friend declined to yield to me a moment ago. I think he will now, as he has yielded to another.

Mr. FRYE. I will not.

Mr. MYERS. You have yielded to another after declining to yield to me.

Mr. FRYE. I am not going to yield any more.

Mr. MYERS. Then I must take it that the gentleman is afraid of my question.

Mr. FRYE. O, bless my soul! I was not born in the woods to be scared at an owl.

Mr. MYERS. Very well; then take the owl's question and you may find some wisdom in it.

Mr. FRYE. I desire now to call the attention of the House to another company which is partly mutual and partly stock, called the Columbia Insurance Company. This company made its reports and its dividends. In 1860 it lost $86,000. The next year it made over $1,000,000; the next year $2,000,000; the next year nearly $2,000,000. Our people were insured in this company. It said it had $3,000,000 of assets; it had declared dividends of 50, and 20, and 25 per cent. But one day it disappeared. With all its profits and all its assets, what did it pay its creditors? Five per cent.! That company claims $780,000 under this bill. Suppose you pay that claim. You provide it shall be paid to the men who contributed to the losses. Who did contribute to them? The men who received dividends in 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1864 equal to, if not more than, the amount that they paid?

A gentleman of my district said to me the other day, "I was insured in that company; my vessel was lost; I never received a dollar for my $40,000 of insurance. Are you going to give this money by your bill to the men who received dividends for three years, and leave me who never received a dollar, who lost $40,000 by the company, out in the cold?" I told him no; that there was no justice and no equity in doing so; that the creditors of the company should have the money if the claim was ever allowed.

Again, sir, I have here a law of the State of New York passed in 1857, an act in relation to mutual insurance companies. It provides that any three hundred gentlemen may associate themselves together as a mutual insurance company. They shall give notes which shall be the capital of the company; and they may issue policies as a mutual company. They shall on their profits first pay themselves 7 per cent. annual interest on the notes which they have put in as capital; they shall then take one-third of all the rest of the profits and give it to themselves, and then divide with the policy-holders the other two-thirds, less expenses! That is a law of New York passed in 1857, and it is the law to-day. One-half of these companies are acting under that law, and are as much stock companies as any stock companies in the country, only they are more extortionate.

I have here insurance gazettes. I ran over them last night with the thermometer at 95. I find nine companies here—mutual companies—located in Buffalo, Albany, and the city of New York, paying out to stockholders 7 per cent., 8 per cent., 10 per cent., and to the policy-holders another rate per cent. Strange associations of "gentlemen guaranteeing each other against loss!" Did I say too much to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] when yesterday, during the course of his speech, I told him that the committee had been cheated into the position which they occupied on this bill?

Mr. TREMAIN. Will you answer me a question?

Mr. FRYE. No, I will not.

Mr. TREMAIN. You make a charge of fraud, and submit to no answer. That is courage!

Mr. FRY. The charge was made yesterday when the gentleman had an hour to himself; it was made in the midst of his speech, and he had ample time to answer it without taking time out of my half-hour.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I trust that in view of these facts the mutual insurance companies will be stricken out of the bill. They will then be left on the same footing as the stock insurance companies, to be paid in case they lost and only in such case. That is where they ought to stand if they are in the bill at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a very few words (for I find my time is nearly out) in relation to another class of losers for whom I have great sympathy. It may be true that my sympathy is born of the fact that there are thousands of them in my own district. I admit that this may influence my judgment. But, sir, they are men who paid the war premiums. You had at the end of the war one million of tonnage engaged in foreign commerce. If it had not been for those men you would not have had a ship sailing the American flag on the ocean. Those men were patriotic; they were true; they knew that Great Britain had sent out these pirates upon our seas to prey upon our commerce; and they would not put their ships under the flag which had thus disgraced itself. So they clung to the old flag; they bore the Stars and Stripes over the waters all through the war—why? To make money? The gentleman from New York [Mr. BASS] has said that they made immense profits. Let me tell that gentleman that they did not make a dollar; they lost all through the war; and any man of ordinary common sense and intelligence can see it in the twinkling of an eye, from the statement of the case. Now let me suppose a case. My friend and I both had ships over in Liverpool. He was sailing his under the English flag. I, true to my country, was sailing mine under the American flag. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] was anxious to send freights abroad. Which ship would he take, all other things being equal, except the hazards of war? He would take the ship sailed by my friend under the English flag; because there would be no danger of detention or loss. At the same price, the shipper prefers the ship of my friend, and he will not take mine unless I make it to his advantage pecuniarly to do so. Now how can I do that? I must pay a war premium on my ship. What else? I must pay a war premium on his freight. Then having paid two war premiums, I must carry the freight at 10 per cent. less than this other gentleman on account of the risk of the venture. The other vessel takes another freight, and we both land at the port to which we are bound on the same day. How, pray, have I made money in that operation? How could I? Nobody but a fool would pay me the two war premiums for the sake of sending his freight by my vessel. That was the result all over the country; and on some freight from San Francisco to New York the charges for insurance alone was actually more than the freight money to be earned.

Now, sir, there were in my district a great many of these men running ships during the war; and I remember very well that when the news came that privateers were abroad, and under the protection of England, our merchantmen and our ship-owners were filled with terror and dismay. They had their fortunes scattered all over the oceans of the world and were in danger of losing them at any moment. I remember how these genteel insurance companies came down into our district and said "Gentlemen, we will protect you against loss." How will you do it? "We will name our own war premium, doubling up what was the risk, making it absolutely certain we will make profit out of the business." What more? No gentleman seems to have thought, or at least seems to have alluded to it. They said to us further "One thing more we require of you, and that is you shall put a double or third more valuation upon your ship."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FRYE. One word more, Mr. Speaker, and the time can be taken out of that allowed to my colleague from Maine.

They said to us, "You must put your ship's valuation one-third more or double more than her worth." If the vessel is injured in a foreign port she had there to be refitted at gold rates. They got double premium, and then they obtained additional premium upon the excessive valuation of a vessel; upon a vessel worth $100,000 they got $50,000 not represented by any value whatever. These insurance companies, having suffered loss and paid $50,000 more than the vessel was worth, now come before the Geneva tribunal and say the Government of the United States there claimed $150,000 for a ship worth only $100,000, and that in all cases you have to pay them for that fictitious value over and above the real value of the vessel. Sir, I trust these war-premium men who at their own sacrifice, at the risk of their fortune, carried our flag through the years of peril, will not be put aside by the insurance companies, which made their millions out of the same peril. I trust, now that we have the power, now that it is in our hands, now that we can do as we will, we shall try to do what the God of justice will have men always do, that which is right, that which is just, that which is equi able.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have given to this subject such study and consideration as I have been able to command, with the simple purpose of satisfying myself what course this great fund should take in order that substantial justice should be done in pursuance of the purpose and spirit of the negotiation of the treaty of Washington and the award of the great tribunal. It is not necessary for me to say, sir, that I represent nobody interested in this money. I do not know but constituents of mine may be, but I know of none interested, and the views which I have will not be pressed with a vigor equal to that which has been exhibited by gentlemen who do represent interests to be affected by this bill.

At the outset I must say, Mr. Speaker, in perfect candor and respect to the gentlemen who have preceded me—for none entertains for them higher regard than I do—that such cause never had such advocates before in all the legislation, in all the tribunals where the rights of men were settled. Able men, men whose reputation has challenged my admiration and whom I respect, men whose lives are above suspicion or reproach, somehow or other hold it is the duty of this Government to distribute this fund in a way not to heal up the wounds of the war, not to restore and build up the fortunes destroyed by the calamity which befell this nation, but to increase and further fill the great coffers of those who speculated on the chances of the war and who made money while our flag was assailed.

Mr. Speaker, I have no reproaches for those gentlemen, but I call the attention of the House to the fact, and I state it candidly, that they have misstated the ground upon which they make their speeches; they have misstated the premises upon which the argument of this question should be made. They have assumed, as though it was a question beyond dispute, that the Government had gone over collecting claims for a lot of gentlemen who made money in the war, and therefore the Congress is precluded by such act from paying this money to any other than these insurance companies, which during the war received ten millions for war premiums and paid but little over five millions for war losses.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the record there is no reason for any such position. Not in the record of the tribunal, not in the record of the war, not in the official proceedings of the counsel of the United States, the counsel engaged in that great tribunal, is justification anywhere to be found for the assertion that this fund is a fund awarded because particular insurance companies had sustained particular losses. And I call the attention of gentlemen of this House to this question—those who, like myself, have no earthly interest in the matter—and ask them to follow me as I examine the premises upon which these arguments and assumptions stand. If their premises fail, their conclusions must fail also. And I will not say anything now of the enormities of the course they propose to pursue regarding the distribution of this fund, but take what shall be a legal view of the record and of the rules adopted in that case.

First, Mr. Speaker, I again call the attention of the House to the letter of instructions of Mr. Fish to the counsel at Geneva, which has already been read in the course of this debate:

> The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two governments, and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross. In the discussion of this question, and in the treatment of the entire case, you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded or what may be recovered, in the event of the appointment of the board of assessors mentioned in the tenth article of the treaty. It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such committal be avoided in the arguments of counsel.

I call attention to these emphatic words, and if after the reading of them the learned gentleman can argue that the Government was committed to pay the money it collected to the insurance companies, then indeed, sir, I misunderstand the plain, ordinary import of the English language:

> The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case.

And yet we are told by gentlemen, aged and learned in the law, that we were committed by the decision of this tribunal to the payment of this money to the insurance companies. That decision does not exist. It is not to be found in the award of the tribunal or the records relating to it.

Then the counsel said to the tribunal at Geneva, following the instructions of the Government emanating from Washington:

> These claims are all preferred by the United States as a nation against Great Britain as a nation—

Not as the agent of insurance companies going over to collect debts. But—> preferred by the United States as a nation, against Great Britain as a nation, and are to be so computed and paid, whether awarded as a sum in gross under the seventh article of the treaty or awarded for assessment of amounts under the tenth article.

Mr. Speaker, these are records made at the Geneva tribunal; and it is to the record that I propose to ask the attention of the House, in order to see whether these distinguished gentlemen have really argued the case fairly and upon the record as it stands.

Now, I go further. I proceed next to examine the opinion of a gentleman who figured largely in the case. Before this discussion took place he expressed himself in regard to it. I refer to one of the distinguished counsel at Geneva, Mr. Caleb Cushing, who was not then, as I understand, and never has been, accused at any time of being in the interest of insurance companies either at Geneva or since, although he is an eminent lawyer and in the habit of taking fees I believe in cases. He says in his treaty of Washington:

> In reflecting on this award and seeking to determine its true construction, let us see, in the first place, what it actually expresses, either by inclusion or exclusion.
> The award is to the United States, in conformity with the letter of the treaty, which has for its well-defined object to remove and adjust complaints and claims "on the part of the United States."
>
> But the history of the treaty and of the arbitration shows that the United States recover, not for the benefit of the American Government as such—

Here is an answer to the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE]— > but of such individual citizens of the United States as shall appear to have suffered loss—

Not for the benefit of those who have made money out of the chances of war, but of those—> who have suffered loss by the acts or neglects of the British government. It is, however, not a special trust legally affected to any particular claim or claimants, but a general fund to be administered by the United States in good faith, in conformity with their own conceptions of justice and equity, within the range of the award. If, according to any theory of distribution adopted by the United States the sum awarded prove inadequate, we have no claim on Great Britain to supply the deficiency; on the other hand, if the award should prove to be in excess, we are not accountable to Great Britain for any balance. On this point precedents exist in the diplomatic history of Great Britain herself.

> The tribunal does not afford us any rules of limitation affecting the distribution of the award, unless in the declaration that "prospective earnings," "double claims" for the same losses, and "claims for gross freights," cannot properly be made the subject of compensation—that is to say, as against Great Britain.
> Nor does the tribunal define affirmatively what claims should be satisfied—

Yet it is said that the tribunal has done so—> otherwise than in the comprehensive terms of the award, which declares that the sum awarded is "the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal, conformably to the provisions contained in article 7 of the aforesaid treaty." The arbitrators, be it observed, do not say for the satisfaction of certain specific claims among those referred to the consideration of the tribunal, but of "all the claims" so referred comformably to the provisions of the treaty.

Now, the practical question which arises is, whether the schedules of claims which were presented to the tribunal as documentary proofs on the part of the United States are conclusive, either as to what they contain or what they do not contain, to establish rules of distribution under the award.

This point is settled by what occurred in discussions before the tribunal.

Great Britain had presented a table composed in large part of estimates, appreciations, and arbitrary or suppositious averages; in consequence of which the United States presented other tables, to which the British agent objected that these tables comprehended claimants and subjects of claims not comprised in the actual schedules filed by the United States; to which the American agent replied by showing that the tribunal had before it, in virtue of the treaty, all the reclamations made by the United States in the interests of individuals injured, and comprised under the generic name of Alabama claims.

This is an argument so completely in point, that I ask the candid consideration of every gentleman to it before he votes on this important question.

Now, then, having first established by the instructions of our Secretary of State to our counsel at Geneva, next by the statement of the counsel themselves on the part of the United States, let me go further and see what the tribunal itself actually did with reference to these claims, and see from that if we cannot draw an argument which is quite as strong as these arguments so eloquently put upon premises which did not exist. With reference to the final arriving at the award this transpired. I quote again from Mr. Cushing in his "Treaty of Washington:"

Some discussions on the same subject afterward occurred between Mr. Staempfli and Sir Alexander Cockburn, which conclusively prove that the result reached did not accept as binding either the tables presented by the United States or the deductions therefrom claimed by Great Britain. The estimate of Mr. Staempfli seems to have been the basis of conclusion; and that estimate is founded on dividing the difference between the American estimate of $14,437,000 and the British estimate of $7,074,000, the mean of which is $10,905,000; which mean does not in any sort represent the actual claims of the United States. Indeed, one of the arbitrators expressly declared that, in arriving at a conclusion, the arbitrators were not to be regarded as making an assessment, or confining themselves to the schedules, estimates, or tables of either of the two governments.

I will stop here to discuss that for a moment in the light of a little plain, practical sense, if I can command any. Let us see how it was. This grand suit, the grandest ever engaged in by mortal man or civilized nation, was instituted for the purpose of adjudicating all claims which were presented by one government against another government, founded upon repeated injuries, as claimed by our Government, to the commerce and to individuals of the United States. For the purpose of estimating those damages a number of circumstances and elements entered into the computation. Large numbers of claims were referred there, some of them double claims. Then when the arbitrators got down to the work they took the claims as presented by the United States and as admitted by Great Britain, added them together and divided the total by two, and then decided that the sum thus arrived at would be sufficient to pay all the losses and all the claims referred to the tribunal by the treaty.

Then he goes on to say:

Whether the sum awarded be adequate, depends, in my opinion, on whether distribution be made among actual losers only and citizens of the United States.

It was believed to be a sufficient sum, and I believe it is sufficient, to pay all actual losses; but it will not be sufficient to pay the absolute losses if you appropriate a large part of it in the way asked for by the gentlemen who have argued against this bill.

Now, every lawyer knows that in trying a case, say for damages for assault and battery, where the jury have to assess damages, he may put in the doctor's bill, the grocer's bill, and the lawyer's bill for the purpose of showing the court and jury what should be the award of damages. But will any gentleman contend that where on a claim of that kind a judgment of the court is obtained, the grocer's bill, and the doctor's bill, and the lawyer's bill, which were brought before the court as elements on which to estimate damages, would have priority of right as against the judgment recovered over other men who were also creditors of the successful suitor? And yet that is precisely the line of reasoning which is followed by my very venerable, respected, and learned brethren of the bar in this case. That is exactly the position in which they stand before the House. Why, sir, any lawyer who in such a case as I have suggested would attempt to direct the fund after it was collected to the doctor and grocer would be hooted out of court. He is not lawyer enough to recover a judgment if he contends that these particular claims had priority over other legal claims against the successful party.

Now, that is a very simple way of illustrating it; but if it is not a perfect illustration of this case, then I confess I do not understand it. I have established, it seems to me, that the committee are right in their report, and now I will go a little further. During the examination of this case we had before us a distinguished lawyer who was at Geneva, the counsel of the United States, and who is the counsel of the insurance companies now, whether he was at Geneva or not. That distinguished counsel, Mr. Evarts, on the 30th day of January, 1874, while discussing the matter before the committee, made some statements which helped us on this question and showed distinctly that not even he, with all his varied learning and power as a lawyer, had the hardihood to stand up and say that there was any superior right on the part of the insurance companies to this fund as against any other man who had lost by the Alabama and other cruisers. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] asked the distinguished counsel some questions which he answered in that peculiarly happy manner in which he can use the English language, without expressing a very plain meaning. I quote his testimony:

Mr. BUTLER. If it will not disturb you, I wish to ask a question. Would it be the duty of our Government to pay from this fund a clear, direct loss of a vessel by the Alabama, for example which was not presented in the tabular statement or the demands put by our Government before the tribunal of arbitration?

Mr. EVARTS. I have not the least difficulty in answering the question. My view of it is, undoubtedly it would. The measure of what we presented, and what the claims falling, under certain principles and rules would be essential, in my judgment, such as either on the one hand to make this Government responsible for the amounts of those claims put forward so that it could scrutinize them as it was its duty to do, or on the other hand—to answer directly the chairman's question—not to exclude a proved claim not named hitherto to our Government, and not embraced in the computations. The transaction having been of the character of finding out in gross between the countries what covered claims on certain principles and not otherwise. But how a court will actually dispose of that question, if it ever shall become a matter of competition and struggle between claimants, I really can hardly be called upon to determine.

Mr. BUTLER. Assuming that there is an excess of the fund?

Mr. EVARTS. O, well, then I think they are all entitled, because no principles are violated. They are included under a measure that Great Britain has admitted and that we have asked.

After that my practical friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] a member of the committee, who is so fond of catechising everybody, asked him a straightforward and express question. I give the question and also the answer:

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then there was no merit in presenting the claim originally?

Mr. EVARTS. That is my judgment.

Mr. BUTLER, with all his tenacity and sagacity, was unable to keep him squarely up to the point for some reason or other. He dodged him with more facility than he did the gentleman from Wisconsin. The gentleman from Wisconsin asked him this question: "Then there was no merit in pressing the claim originally?" Mr. Evarts replied: "That is my judgment." And it is mine; and, if so, then I ask what is the judgment of my able, distinguished, enlightened, cultivated friends on the committee?

Now I have another view of this case to which I wish to call attention before I leave it and pass to other considerations. If we are to believe alone the sublime declarations and the fervid eloquence of the gentlemen who have advocated the claims of these insurance companies, we would almost begin to think that there was nobody in the war who suffered anything but them. Now what are the facts? The obligation of the Government is equal to all its citizens. I have shown that this is a great trust fund, awarded by this high tribunal to repair the damages done by the war. How shall we divide it? There is no such thing as a legal claim on the part of the insurance companies; it is not even contended that there is. And if such claim is put forward I disprove it out of the mouth of their highest authority and from the record. All over the country, along the coasts of New England, are the men who paid these enormous war premiums. I have here a statement made by one of a firm who paid over $38,000 to an insurance company, and the company failed, and they did not get a cent. Now the company is here asking to have their claim paid. This is the statement of a member of that firm:

WASHINGTON, January, 1874.

To the House of Representatives Judiciary Committee:

During the war of the rebellion, as a member of the late firm of Walsh, Carver & Chase, I paid to insurance companies $38,548.48 increased premiums for war insurance, as shown by policies now in my possession. On neither of these policies have they ever paid a dollar. The whole amount was profit to the insurance companies. Two vessels, the Delphine and the Alina, of which my firm owned a part, and on which we had no insurance, were destroyed by the Shenandoah before she went to Australia, by which we lost $14,000. The insurance companies now claim that the amount received from England as indemnity should be paid to them, added to their profit of $38,548.48, and that I should have nothing. Would this be right?

Respectfully yours,

B. CARVER,
Now of CARVER & BARNES,
No. 30 South street, New York.

Now, in view of these records and these facts, I want the kind-hearted and able gentlemen who said that they could not see how they could stand up in the face of the civilization of these times and advocate this bill to take their words backs, and to help distribute this fund to the men who have actually lost. I say to them that they must not shake their bony fingers and hoary locks at me and say I am wrong. If the blush of shame shall ever rest upon anybody's cheek by reason of anything done in connection with this bill, it will be upon the cheek of my venerated friend and not upon mine. I have a just pride in saying that those who suffered should be paid. That is the direct course for a great nation to pursue, when it has a fund to award to its citizens, unrestrained by any arbitrary rule, and governed only by those great rules of equity and justice which should control the action of a government toward all its citizens, high and low, poor and rich. I desire to say a few words more. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HURLBUT.) The gentleman has ten minutes.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I must say a word or two more in relation to some facts of this case. There are so many things that might be said that I hardly know where to begin or what to leave unsaid. The views I present are of course hurried, not prepared as have been the views of gentleman on the other side. But there is one thing that has become somewhat of a personal matter, though I never have any personal controversies with anybody. I do not know why it is, whether persons are afraid to have any with me, or because of my good-nature; but I never have any. Perhaps it is because I am afraid. The remarks of my friend and colleague on the committee [Mr. FRYE] suit me in the main so well and are so good that I dislike to refer to those in regard to mutual insurance companies. In the committee mutual insurance companies were put on the same footing with the war-premium payers. I think still that they belong there if they are mutual insurance companies; if not then they do not come within the provisions of the bill. I do not understand a mutual insurance company to be what my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] says. I understand it is an association of gentlemen who agree to guarantee each other against loss, and raise a fund for that purpose; that after they have paid their losses that portion of premiums which is not distributed for losses is returned to the policy-holders and premium payers. Sometimes being held in reserve against extraordinary losses they have a large fund on hand, belonging in fact to those who take policies in the company. After a time that fund is redistributed. I am satisfied, notwithstanding the positive statements of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] that they are entirely in error in regard to these mutual insurance companies. There may be companies part stock and part mutual; but it is the mutual insurance company that I am talking about. In my mind that is a company that stands upon the same footing as the war-premium payer.

Mr. TREMAIN. Is not the bill expressly confined to the mutual insurance companies, so far as they are admitted?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Yes; and I think it unfair. I have said it privately, and I repeat it now, it is unfair, for the gentleman, upon a mistaken statement of facts, to come in now and argue that the bill which they agreed upon in its present form shall be changed by striking out the mutual insurance companies. I am not lifting my voice in defense of mutual insurance companies. The action of the insurance companies in relation to this fund all the way through, has been so odious to me that I will not lift my voice in defense of these companies. If this statement is not sufficient to retain them in the bill, then let them go out.

Mr. TREMAIN. As this question of fraud has been raised, will the gentleman allow me to ask a single question?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I dislike to refuse; the gentleman knows I do. Go on.

Mr. TREMAIN. Is it not true that the mutual insurance companies were not put in the bill at all by the committee until you took the position that you would not put in the war-premium men otherwise, and you held the balance of power in the committee?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. If it is proper for me to state what occurred in committee——

Mr. TREMAIN. It has been alluded to on the other side in a charge of fraud.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No man on our side has alluded to anything that occurred in committee.

Mr. TREMAIN. It has been charged that there was a fraud perpetrated in the committee.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. No fraud was perpetrated upon me. I was not deceived, and am not deceived now. If there has been any fraud perpetrated, it is since the bill came out of committee; it is on the information furnished by my friend from Maine, and in which he is mistaken.

But, Mr. Speaker, my time is running out and I must conclude. I trust you will not find fault with me if I indulge in some general remarks in regard to the character of the grand tribunal by which this award was made. As I have stated, I have no interest in the result of this award. If this House should see fit to send this money in directions which I believe to be wrong, I have no fault to find. I shall feel conscious that I have discharged my duty in relation to this fund. As for the rest the responsibility is on the Congress of the United States. It does not lie in my mouth to complain of its action. But I do take pride in the grand achievements of this country during the last few years, among which was the organization of this high tribunal. I do insist that, being the highest type of court that ever sat to adjudicate upon the rights of mortal man, it having given to us that fund based upon the equitable claim of one government against another for indemnity, that fund should be distributed to those who have suffered losses and not to those who have made money. Before the decision of the tribunal at Geneva, how anxious were all the people upon the subject of our complicated relations with Great Britain, I need not tell—all remember.

How proud of the complete success of that great suit to which our nation and England were the only parties, but in which all civilized nations, all humanity, were profoundly interested, our people may justly be I need not undertake to state.

The indecent haste of England in according belligerent rights to one enemy, without a vessel or a flag—the encouragement she gave desperate men to fit out, and the aid of her citizens in fitting out and arming cruisers to prey upon and destroy our commerce, and the vast destruction which followed, and was winked at by the government and applauded by the people of Great Britain, while pretending to be our neutral friends, and while we were engaged in a struggle the like of which was never seen, for very life, constituted outrages that awakened a depth of indignation and engendered a measure of bitterness in the minds of our people against Great Britain, which it seemed for years could only end in war and be wiped out in blood.

How the discussions upon this great question have been carried on by these two peoples, how calm, humane, and grand councils have prevailed; how war with its attendant horrors has been happily and completely averted, peace maintained and assured, and good will restored are matters of history, telling of our peaceful triumphs, and brightly shining on the page next to that which records our sufferings and achievements in a war for life and liberty, and which, taken together, give Americans a fame for valor, justice, and forbearance second to no people of whom history speaks. It was a great day for the United States when peace was won and declared. It was a greater day for all the nations when the United States and Great Britain, having such cause of quarrel, submitted it to such a tribunal as that at Geneva; and it was the crowning day of all when that tribunal made its award and these great nations accepted it as final and complete.

How much that precedent will do for peace hereafter, how much destruction it will save, how many wars prevent, how much suffering and misery avert, no one can tell; but it is a great point gained for peace, a long step toward the time when disputes between nations shall be settled without blood, the time—

When man shall cease his fellow-man to slay.

That blessed time of which the poet says—

Thou glorious era, come! Hail blessed time
When full orb'd freedom shall unclouded shine,
When the chaste muses, nurtured in her rays,
In olive groves shall tune their sweetest lays;
When bounteous Ceres shall direct the car
O'er fields now blasted by the fires of war,
And angels view with love and wonder joined,
The golden age returned to bless mankind.

If the military achievements of President Grant shall fade and perish from the memory of man, if his advisers and Cabinet officers have failed to make lasting impressions upon the history of events of the past few years in other respects; in the record of the negotiations of the treaty of Washington and the proceedings and judgment and award of this tribunal, shall they all live and be honored, revered, and loved when all the passions of these times are dead, when all these warm hearts are still and cold, when all who now are here have passed away.

A new starting point in the progress of our civilization has been erected, and it is planted upon the rock of justice. All humanity is enlisted and interested in its support; it is just and must endure while justice lasts; it is humane and kind; it is love of man for fellow-man, and as God is love, like Him it shall be eternal. Inclining all the nations of the earth toward peace it shall bless the world as only peace can bless mankind. It is the birth of a new law of love to the nations.

Ye have heard that it hath been said an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth; but this says strive no more, shed no more innocent blood, make no more orphans for wounded national honor or because of national wrongs. This points out a peaceful way to solve these questions; follow it ye nations.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing so hard to defeat in Congress as the influence of an interest concentrated in the hands of a few men, representing a large sum of money. I do not mean by this to say that I believe that money is used to corrupt Congress. My belief is the other way. But it is a fact, constantly pressing itself upon the minds of other members, much, I presume, as it does upon mine, that an interest with a large amount depending on the action of Congress, especially when concentrated in a few men or a few corporations, will never down. It constantly presents itself here. Beaten to-day, it lifts its head again to-morrow. Public opinion stamps upon it the seal of reprobation, and yet it does not retire from the field. Congress strikes it apparently dead, yet it revives; it has a living force behind it in human greed, and takes advantage of every recess of Congress, of every suspension of public opinion upon the merits of its claims, and puts out its feelers in every direction to gain friends. That has been proved so in many cases, not only in this Congress but in others; and the case presented by the insurance companies to-day illustrates completely what I have said. These few companies have at stake between five and six millions of dollars. They have been before one Congress ignominiously kicked out by a vote in this House of more than two to one; yet they have never rested on that verdict. In the same Congress their claims were presented in the Senate, and were there, as in the House, thrown out. They have since been industriously at work to secure a different result. I know how they have been working. I have received letters and circulars by the cord as other members have. I of course was prepared (because it was a subject to which I had given investigation, and in which my constituents are interested) to meet all this. But these companies proceed on the assumption that upon these claims, which keenly involve important interests in parts of the country, many men will not have made up their minds. So their pertinacious approaches have been in some cases unresisted. They come here resting upon no claim to sympathy whatever—no claim of suffering, no claim that injuries should be repaired; they come here resting upon a narrow proposition of law, as applied by the courts between man and man, and they insist that Congress, with a great fund belonging to the nation with which to do justice, should judge in this case, just as a county court would do in a case between A and B, where the doctrine of subrogation might apply.

That is how these companies appear; and it was threatened yesterday by a gentleman here that whatever happens these companies would never cease to besiege Congress. He believed in the vitality that rests in an interest that represents nearly $6,000,000.

Not so with that which antagonizes. I represent here, as does my colleague, [Mr. FRYE,] who has spoken so eloquently, a district largely involved in the navigation and commercial interests of the United States. Has any gentleman pictured to himself the time when that interest was struck down by an almost mortal blow, an interest that was the pride of the American citizen everywhere, that was carrying the freights of the world; but which, when the rebellion broke out and the cruisers fitted out in Great Britain went upon the sea, at once sunk down almost to its final death. There was a hardship everywhere on the sea-board; men found that their business had gone, their ships were lying at the wharves, and there was nothing for them to do. They went to freighters and they were repulsed. The commission merchant gave them the cold shoulder. They went to the insurance companies and found the doors shut upon them. They were obliged to lay up their vessels which floated the American flag or to go on and pay the ruinous war premiums, which depleted their fortunes and ruined their vocation. They were compelled to take either the one or the other course.

Sir, there are in my district to-day men who have given an honest life to the business of building and sailing ships; who in 1861 owned vessels small and great, who had invested in them all their accumulations, and who, because of the strain which was put upon them, because of the burdens which were laid by the insurance companies and the meager freights made, became poor and have so remained ever since. The war closed, leaving them in that condition. The Government recognized it. It was pressed, Mr. Speaker, in every direction to help this suffering interest. The newspapers urged it; Representatives spoke for them in Congress, demanding that reparation should be made by Great Britain, and that our Government should see to it that it was promptly done. The Government respected the sentiments of the people, and organized that great tribunal at Geneva which my friend from Illinois [Mr. WARD] has so well spoken of. I know that throughout the length and breadth of my sea-board district, in the hearts of all men who had been waiting five years to be paid for their losses, a cry of joy went up when at last they saw that there was an opportunity in some degree to be made whole. The men who lost in vessels and had no insurance felt that relief was at hand. The men who had been drained of their life-blood by these insurance companies as by leeches, the men who paid enormous war premiums, who had impaired their fortunes, saw relief in that act of the Government. In all the villages and hamlets in my district, sir, there was no man of such morbid imagination as to doubt that he would speedily be paid through this great tribunal and that it would be paid. Nobody was found who suggested that the insurance companies which had been the means of sinking the business and the fortunes of the ship-owners would clamor for the bulk of the fund and fight action until they got it.

The Government, as I have said, Mr. Speaker, recognized and respected that sentiment of the people, and under its sanction the arbitration commission met. I will say nothing about counsel being engaged at the Geneva tribunal for the insurance companies. It was certainly the fact that as soon as the result became known and it became certain that the money would be paid into the Treasury, it was found that the leading counsel for the insurance companies had been leading counsel of the Government before the Geneva tribunal. Gentlemen may make the best of that, and apply to it such reasoning as human experience naturally will suggest. Notwithstanding that, through the firmness of the Secretary of State (and it is to his honor that this can be said) and because Mr. Bancroft Davis was a sturdy man and persistently took care that the Government of the United States did not involve itself as to the distribution of the sum collected, the Government was left to divide this money among the sufferers, whoever they may be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the money is in the Treasury. To-day these insurance companies come as they did in the last Congress, and because they believed they have increased their forces here demand that they shall be recognized and paid, and that these men in my district who have suffered shall go without it. For, sir, there is not enough money for all. The claim is urged without hesitation and with an effrontery I have seldom seen on this floor. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] an old lawyer and judge, declares that to resist the claims of these insurance companies is no better than stealing. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] who has not learned that hard words are not the style of argument for this House whatever they may be for a New York jury, declares that to resist the men whom he represents here violates every principle of common honesty. His colleague, [Mr. WOODFORD,] a younger lawyer I am bound to say, and using words with no great discrimination but equally inclined to abuse, declares that we are pettifogging when we seek to prevent the insurance companies, which were paid a profit of 100 per cent. by my constituents and by those of other gentlemen, from adding to that another 50 per cent.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I cannot yield as my time is nearly out. Let us reason for a moment about this matter, and see where common honesty is and where the pettifogging is. I do not know exactly what the gentleman took the word to mean. But I suppose, if it has any application in this case, that pettifogging is seeking to evade common justice by some quibble or technical point of law. Now, let me reason for a moment between the insurance companies and war-premium men, and let us see what is pettifogging and what is common honesty. Let us deal a little in logic.

The claims of the first class of men who ask for money here are not disputed. They are the men who owned ships and lost them and received no insurance. Everybody admits that they should be paid. Why? Because they lost and have not been recompensed. The next set of claimants that come in are the insurance companies, who set up a claim for insurance paid. We say that they ought not to have it unless each company should show a loss. And why? Because they have been once paid. Is not that fair? By whom have they been paid? By American citizens owning vessels and freight; nobody doubts this; the books and returns of these companies show it; my colleague has given you the figures. Then we come to a third class. Here we find the man who when he could get no freight insured his vessel at an enormous premium and took a freight insured at a like premium. He is the man who recompensed the insurance. The insured owner of a destroyed vessel looked to the insurance company; the insurance company looked to the war-premium man. Who has the war-premium man to look to if not to us. This man is my constituent. Does he stand here before this House in any way relieved? We have got rid of the man who owned the vessel and had no insurance, because we pay him. We refuse to pay the insurance companies, because they have been paid by the war-premium men. At last we strike hard-pan. We have found a man whom nobody has paid. He is at the bottom, and he ventures to lift up his voice for relief, and some of us dare to speak for him at the risk of being called pettifoggers and thieves. He can look to nobody else. He had nobody to charge his insurance to. He was competing with British vessels that paid no war risk, perhaps with his neighbor, who had put his craft under the British flag; and while he paid war premiums on the one hand, his receipts were shrunk on the other hand by running for less freight.

Is there any man here listening to this bit of logic who will say that we are pettifogging for the war-premium man? Will you send them away from these doors and add to the plethoric pockets of the insurance companies, already full?

Take another case—the case represented by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE,] of a vessel captured by the Shenandoah before her departure from Melbourne; a ship fitted out in British ports, sailing on the high seas and striking down our vessels; fitted out as the Alabama was, but ruled out by the tribunal because our Government through its diplomatic representatives did not take exactly the proper form of remonstrance before she left the British port where she was fitted up, and could not prove such action until she arrived at Melbourne. There is a technical point that comes in the way of my friend from Ohio getting money for his suffering and ruined constituents. And because he dares to raise his voice on their behalf for a little of the money that lies in the Treasury, which does not want it and does not claim it, my friend from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] and these other gentlemen say that he wants to violate common honesty and that he is pettifogging for his ruined constituents. I have just such cases in my own district, and Mr. Davis and Mr. Cushing say that nothing in the acts of the Geneva tribunal bars our Government from paying such claims.

But my friend from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] appears with a bill to send everybody to the courts and to take this question away from Congress. No man can do by indirection what he is not allowed to do directly with a soberer face than Judge POLAND. He says, "Why not send this case to the courts?" And other gentlemen around me have said, "Why not send it to the court and let it be settled?"

Mr. POLAND. Why not?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This is why not. Mr. Speaker, this proposition means the payment to the insurance companies, and nothing else. The gentleman himself said yesterday that he did not believe that the courts would allow the enhanced-premium men to get a dollar from this fund, but he believed they would give it to the insurance companies. Sir, I am myself of the belief that that is the danger if it goes to a court, and for this reason: Our courts to-day, whether sitting as courts of law or of equity, are bound by a long-settled train of decisions. Let no man here be deluded by the words "in equity" in Judge POLAND'S bill. Equity to-day, sir, as interpreted by the courts, is not as it was in the time of Lord Coke, when, seeking to ameliorate the rigidness of the common law by the flexibility of equity, he invoked the arbitrio boni viri.

Since that day equity in the courts has become as fixed, has become almost as much narrowed, has become a matter of precedent and decision, almost as much as the common law. No court in equity rejects the doctrine of subrogation as applied to the insurance company. They have a technical claim that only Congress can set aside in favor of the real claim, resting upon equity in its broad, common acceptation. There are some things that Congress can do better than the courts, and it has always kept its hold upon this fund to do justice with it. Congress imposes taxes and thereby burdens the people. It lays income taxes, though the lawyers say it cannot make a discriminating tax. It sets the machinery of the Government at work to collect the tax, for all the lawyers are against it.

It can relieve burdens equally by distributing a fund that was demanded to relieve men who suffered from the acts of Great Britain in fitting out rebel cruisers.

That is the reason why I object to sending this matter to the courts. The gentleman himself, who is an insurance man, knows that this scheme of his is in favor of the insurance companies when he urges it upon the House; and when he endeavors to persuade members that this whole thing can be settled by the courts he knows what he is about. He knows that the insurance companies are safe in his hands. Representing the interest that is just beginning to rally from the breaking down and disastrous effects of the war, which prostrated it more than it prostrated any other interest in the country, I urge that this House, so far as it can, settle this matter here and now.

As I said in the beginning, these gentlemen have forgotten that Congress has already passed once upon this question. This House, Mr. Speaker, last year passed on the very proposition, put I think in the same words by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] and voted it down, and this is the record of the vote: yeas 68, nays 125. There were two men to one in the Forty-second Congress who in spite of the specious arguments of the gentleman from Vermont voted down his proposition; and then on top of that, on a bill almost like the bill which my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is urging here to-day, passed it through the House by a vote of Yeas 122, nays 56. There were one hundred and twenty-two pettifoggers, men seeking to violate common justice, and only fifty-six high-minded, honest men, thoughtful of the rights of their fellow-men and of common justice, and with perhaps a little kindness for the rich insurance companies all over the land. That was the record of the last Congress. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that in the face of that it requires the effrontery, the matchless audacity of the insurance advocates to try to cram this offensive project down the House by the kind of talk that we have listened to here.

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

[Mr. STARKWEATHER addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the substitute for the Senate bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Clerk read Mr. FRYE's amendment, as follows:

Strike out on page 14, line 64, these words:

Provided, That mutual insurance companies who have paid a loss shall be indemnified for the same, such indemnity to be divided among its members who contributed to pay such loss at the time; but no member of any mutual insurance company shall be indemnified for any war premium paid in such company.

The question being taken on agreeing to Mr. FRYE's amendment, there were—ayes 97, noes 43; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and Mr. FRYE and Mr. KELLOGG were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 137.

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not ask for tellers, and I do not desire a further count.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is next upon the series of amendments proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.]

The Clerk read Mr. TREMAIN's first amendment, as follows:

Page 12. Strike out all after the word "government," in line 12, to and including the words "Great Britain," in line 13, and insert the words "of Great Britain was held liable at Geneva."

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read Mr. TREMAIN's second amendment, as follows:

Page 14. Strike out all after the word "who," in line 47, to and including the word "assured," in line 57, and insert in lieu thereof the words "have paid a loss thereon."

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read Mr. TREMAIN's third amendment, as follows:

Page 14. Strike out lines 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, and 57.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read Mr. TREMAIN's fourth amendment, as follows:

Page 14. After the word "assured," in line 57, insert the words:

Provided also, That mutual insurance companies who have paid a loss shall be indemnified for the same, such indemnity to be apportioned among its members who contributed to pay such loss at the time.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read Mr. TREMAIN's fifth amendment, as follows:

Page 14. Strike out from line 58 to the word "cruisers," in line 64.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is next on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD,] of the Judiciary Committee, to strike out the paragraph in section 1 of the substitute from line 58 to 84 inclusive.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I ask leave to withdraw that amendment. It has been substantially acted upon already.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. All the amendments to perfect the substitute reported from the committee have now been disposed of. The question is next on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] of the Judiciary Committee, for the substitute reported by the committee.

The first five sections of Mr. POLAND's substitute were read.

Mr. POLAND. I hardly think it necessary to read the remaining sections of the substitute, because what they propose in relation to the mode of proceeding are very much the same as in the bill reported by the majority of the committee. I now call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the substitute I have offered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, yes; let us have the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 92, nays 149, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Arthur, Atkins, Bass, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Buckner, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Comingo, Cox, Crittenden, Crooke, Crounse, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Duell, Durham, Freeman, Giddings, Gunckel, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hooper, Hunton, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Killinger, Lamar, Lawson, Leach, Lowndes, Magee, Marshall, McKee, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Myers, Neal, Niles, O'Brien, O'Neill, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Randall, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, Milton Sayler, Scofield, A. Herr Smith, Southard, Standiford, Storm, Swann, Townsend, Tremain, Vance, Waldron, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Wood, Woodford, and John D. Young—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Averill, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Brown, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Amos Clark, jr., Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Creamer, Crocker, Crossland, Crutchfield, Davis, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Fort, Foster, Frye, Glover, Gooch, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Knapp, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Lewis, Lofland, Lowe, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Nesmith, Niblack, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, Pendleton, Phillips, Pike, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Sloss, Small, Smart, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Speer, Sprague, Starkweather, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Wilshire Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, and Woodworth—149.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Albright, Ashe, Barnum, Barry, Bland, Blount, Cessna, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Curtis, DeWitt, Elliott, Field, Garfield, Robert S. Hale, Hays, Hendee, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Holman, Jewett, Kendall, Loughridge, Luttrell, McJunkin, McLean, Mitchell, Negley, Nunn, Potter, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, William A. Smith, Stanard, Stephens, St. John, Stone, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Todd, Waddell, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, and Pierce M. B. Young—48.

So the substitute offered by Mr. POLAND was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. VANCE. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. ASHE, is absent on account of sickness; if here he would vote "ay."

Mr. SENER. I am requested by Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, to say that he is unavoidably detained from the House by sickness and expects to be absent, either on that account or on account of sickness in his family, for the remainder of the session.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the substitute reported by the Committee on the Judiciary for the bill of the Senate.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The question was put, and on a division there were—ayes 37, noes 119.

Mr. ELDREDGE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ELDREDGE, and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 107.

So the motion to lay the bill on the table was not agreed to.

The question was taken upon the substitute reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, as amended; and it was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE and Mr. POLAND called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 132, nays 101, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Averill, Barber, Barrere, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cason, Amos Clark, jr., Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crocker, Crooke, Crossland, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Glover, Gooch, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Hooper, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kelley, Killinger, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Lewis, Lofland, Lowe, Lynch, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. Williams, Wood, and Pierce M. B. Young—56.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the title of the bill, so that it will read as follows: "An act to provide for a just and equitable distribution of the moneys paid in pursuance of the award made to the United States by the commissioners at Geneva under the treaty of Washington."

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the title was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1706) to authorize the opening of Wight street through the grounds of the United States Marine Hospital at Detroit, Michigan.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 693) to change the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Wisconsin at Oshkosh.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to give notice that immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, I shall call up the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. Let us go to business on the Speaker's table for a few moments, to dispose of some matters that will not give rise to debate.

Mr. LAMISON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill in relation to errors in prize-lists be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL. I have moved to adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to give notice to the House that, with the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I shall move to go to business on the Speaker's table, to dispose of matters that will not give rise to discussion, to-morrow, immediately after reading of the Journal, for a short time only.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope that we shall have an evening session to-night, to enable the Committee on War Claims to make some reports.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. A motion to adjourn was made and is now pending.

The question was taken on Mr. RANDALL'S motion, and it was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rules, and referred as stated:

By Mr. COBB, of Kansas: The petition of members of the Delaware tribe of Indians who have become citizens of the United States, that patents be issued to them for their lands and all restrictions removed from the same, and that they be paid the proportion of money held in trust by the United States for them, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of merchants, importers, bankers, and business men of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, protesting against the passage of the twenty-ninth section of the tariff and tax bill which imposes a tax on all sales of stocks, bonds, gold and silver bullion, coin, and other securities; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORTON presented a memorial of citizens of Indianapolis, Indiana, protesting against the passage of a law permitting growers of leaf-tobacco to sell $100 worth of their crop at retail to consumers without license or tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TIPTON presented the petition of Jacob Bogert, praying compensation for loss of the steamer Pocahontas while in the United States service; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 7) for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain, with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 280) granting a pension to Ann Crane;

A bill (H. R. No. 1045) for the relief of B. W. Harris, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Massachusetts;

A bill (H. R. No. 1706) to authorize the opening of Wight street through the grounds of the United States marine hospital at Detroit, Michigan;

A bill (H. R. No. 1753) to authorize medals commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the first meeting of the Continental Congress and of the Declaration of Independence; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2208) authorizing the President to reinstate George M. Book on the active list of the Navy.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the bill (H. R No. 1322) for the relief of George S. Gustin, late a private of Company D, Seventy-fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. I make this motion after consultation with the chairman of that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of certain mail-route agents, asking a change in the law regulating the compensation of route agents, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of the United States, praying that the money-order system be extended to every post-office in the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of California, relative to the mail route from Sebasta City to Lake City in that State, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2979) abolishing the office of appraiser of imported merchandise, appointed under the act of July 14, 1870, and acts amendatory thereof, at certain places, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 867) to amend section 35 of the act entitled "An act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," (the purpose of which he stated was to create Rochester, New York, a port of entry,) reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3594) to amend section 35 of the act entitled "An act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 118) explanatory of the ninth section of the act of July 13, 1866, concerning deposits in savings-banks, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3256) to repeal so much of the act approved May 8, 1872, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1873, and for other purposes," as provides for the employment of persons to assist the proper officers of the Government in discovering and collecting moneys withheld, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 435) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the memorial of John Young, of Amsterdam, New York, praying for an extension of his patent for an improved washing and wringing machine, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY. The Committee on Pensions, who considered at their last meeting House bill No. 2218, granting a pension to Sarah Summerville, and who reported from that last meeting the bill adversely, have again had the same under consideration, it having been since recommitted, and instructed me to now recommend the passage of the bill and we adopt the House report.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3175) for the relief of J. E. Ingalls, postmaster at Denmark, Lee County, Iowa, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 804) equalizing pensions of certain officers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 2791) granting a pension to Franklin Stoner, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 3016) granting a pension to Ira Douthart, have reconsidered the bill and have come to the conclusion that the bill ought to pass, and they have directed me to report it back and I ask that the matter be now passed upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PRATT. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2670) granting a pension to Mary S. Howe, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. The committee do not submit any written report of their own in this case, but adopt the report of the House committee.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3606) granting a pension to Mary E. Grosvenor, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1947) granting a pension to George Holmes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1275) granting a pension to William D. Boyd, of Johnson County, Kentucky, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1234) granting a pension to Mary S. Prince, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of Captain Jonas P. Levy, praying compensation for losses sustained in consequence of his expulsion from Tabasco by the Mexicans at the commencement of the war between the United States and Mexico in 1846, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 47) in aid of the execution of the laws in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes; the bill (S. No. 58) in aid of the execution of the laws in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes; the bill (S. No. 266) for the protection of society in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes; and the bill (S. No. 267) in aid of the execution of the laws in the Territory of Utah, asked to be discharged from their consideration; which was agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3097) in relation to courts and judicial officers in the Territory of Utah, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following petitions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A petition of citizens of Oregon, and Washington Territory, praying to be allowed a pension for services rendered the Government during the Mexican war; and

A petition of Rev. N. Newton Glazier and others, praying for an amendment to the pension laws.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3338) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the Army and Navy pension laws," approved March 3, 1873, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2653) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend work upon the public buildings, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3528) providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to actual settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale, reported it without amendment.

Mr. GORDON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2887) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. No. 922) abolishing the office of appraiser of imported merchandise, appointed under the act of July 14, 1870, and acts amendatory thereof, at certain places; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 899) to constitute Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, a port of delivery, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending the enactment of a law authorizing the transfer of the Fort Dalles military reservation at Fort Dalles, Oregon, to the Secretary of the Interior to be disposed of for cash under existing laws, and a letter from the Secretary of War asking authority to sell the military reservation at Camp Cady, California, reported a bill (S. No. 923) to provide for the disposition of useless military reservations; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SCOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2797) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, to report the same back with several amendments and to recommend its passage. I desire in connection with this report to state that I would be glad if I could have the consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill on Monday next after the termination of the morning hour.

Mr. SARGENT. I will not object if it does not interfere with the appropriation bills.

Mr. SCOTT. While upon the subject of reports I would ask for a moment the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. I have presented a number of petitions in favor of what is commonly known as the steamboat bill passed by the House at this session, and I am daily in receipt of a large number of letters inquiring as to probable action upon that bill. As it is now before the Committee on Commerce, I think it proper to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether we may expect a report upon that bill at this session in time for action upon it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that that bill has been up several times for examination before the Committee on Commerce, but they have not yet been able to agree upon a report upon the bill. I am in hopes the committee will be able to report before the close of the session, but they are not ready to do so at this time.

Mr. SCOTT. I would express the hope, in view of the fact that a similar bill was reported in the last Congress and failed because of want of time to consider a report of a committee of conference and in view of the fact that thirty-five sections of the bill are really a re-enactment of the existing law, that the Committee on Commerce may find time to report it, so that we may have action upon it at this session.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope so.

Mr. SARGENT. Was any understanding or order made in reference to the bill reported from the Committee on Claims?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to except from any understanding or order the appropriation bills. The Committee on Appropriations have been patient with their bills for several days past, but they have work to bring to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There was no understanding about it.

ARTICLES FOR CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3601) to admit free of duty articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876, to report the same back without amendment, and recommend its passage; and as the object of this bill is manifest on its face, and there is some reason for haste, I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before objecting, I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio how the other committees of this body are going to get up bills to which there is really no objection and which the public interests require and which can be passed in a minute if we get at them, if we take up private bills or bills that are reported from his committee and others, and pass them at once when they are reported? If any way can be pointed out by which the other committees can get hold of the Calendar and put through things which the public interest requires and which will not cause debate, then I do not want to object to this. But if the effect of this every day is to be that the business is preferred which comes last, then a good many of us have been acting on the wrong supposition in getting our bills on the Calendar. I speak in all seriousness, because I wish to have an understanding as to how we can get on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there ought to be a day when unobjected cases can be taken up and promptly disposed of, and when if objection is made to a bill it ought to be put over. This is a matter that everybody understands in the whole breadth and length of it. As a matter of course, we ought to allow articles for this purpose to come in free.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not the least objection to this bill, and I can say the same of a dozen bills reported from one committee that I know of besides others heretofore, some of which relate to private interests and some to public interests, and to which the Senator and everybody would say "amen" if we could only get at them. But how are we to get them through?

Mr. SHERMAN. The members of the Senate having them in charge ought to call them up or have a day set aside for their consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How can I call them up if the reports of to-day take up the whole morning hour? I do not object in this particular instance, because we have taken as much time as it would occupy to pass the bill; but I hope I shall not be thought unfair if I say that for the rest of this morning, in the hope of getting to the Calendar, I shall object to everything out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Ohio?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It allows all articles which shall be imported for the sole purpose of exhibition at the international exhibition to be held in the city of Philadelphia in the year 1876 to be admitted without the payment of duty or of customs fees or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but all such articles as shall be sold in the United States or withdrawn for consumption therein at any time after such importation shall be subject to the duties, if any, imposed on like articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of importation; and in case any articles imported shall be withdrawn for consumption, or shall be sold without payment of duy as required by law, all the penalties prescribed by the revenue laws shall be applied and enforced against such articles and against the persons who may be guilty of such withdrawal or sale.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASSAY OFFICE AT PORTLAND, OREGON.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Committee on Finance have directed me to report the following resolution, and I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to inquire and report at the next session of Congress as to the necessity of an assay office at Portland, Oregon, and if there is such a necessity whether a construction of the same or purchase from the owners of the present private assay office in Portland, as aforesaid, would be most expedient; and also as to the expediency of removing or abolishing the assay office at Boise City, Idaho.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 924) donating condemned cannon to the city of Massillon, Ohio, for monumental purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FISH AND FISHERIES.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the report of the commissioner on fish and fisheries for the years 1873-'74 be printed.

MAIL SERVICE WITH JAPAN AND CHINA.

Mr. SARGANT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be instructed to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary to secure the transportation of the additional semi-monthly mail between San Francisco, Japan, and China.

CLERKS OF COURTS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 752) to compel the performance of certain duties by clerks of courts and other officers of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section provides that if any clerk of any district or circuit court of the United States shall willfully refuse or neglect to make any report, certificate, statement, or other document required by law to be by him made, or shall willfully refuse or neglect to forward any such report, certificate, statement, or document to the Department, officer, or person to whom by law the same should be forwarded, the President of the United States is empowered, and it is hereby made his duty in every such case, to remove such clerk so offending from office by an order in writing for that purpose. Upon the presentation of such order, or a copy thereof authenticated by the Attorney-General of the United States, to the judge of the court whereof such offender is clerk, such clerk shall thereupon be deemed to be out of office, and shall not exercise the functions thereof, and such judge, in the case of the clerk of a district court, shall appoint a successor; and in the case of the clerk of a circuit court the circuit judge shall appoint a successor. The person so removed shall not be eligible to any appointment as clerk or deputy clerk for the period of two years next after such removal.

The second section declares that if any clerk or other officer of the United States mentioned in the preceding section shall willfully refuse or neglect to make or to forward any such report, certificate, statement, or document therein mentioned, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, in the discretion of the court; but a conviction under this section shall not be necessary as a precedent to the removal from office provided for in section 1.

The Committee on the Judiciary proposed to amend the bill in section 1, line 17, by inserting before the word "judge" the word "district."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, line 1, after the word "clerk," to strike out the words "or other officer of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the same section, line 9, before the word "precedent," to insert the word "condition."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. BOREMAN. I should like to have some explanation from the Senator from Vermont in regard to the neglects or failures that this bill is intended to remedy. I do not understand the purpose exactly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The purpose of the bill is to punish the unlawful non-performance of their duties by clerks of the circuit and district courts, whereby they fail to report to the various Departments to which they are required and to the Attorney-General the state of the business on their dockets and the amount of funds, public and other, that have been received and are on deposit, the amount of moneys that have been received by them for fees, &c., the law fixing the limit of their fees and declaring that the balance shall be paid into the Treasury. It is found in many districts, I am ashamed to say for the honor of the judicial department of the Government, that the clerks absolutely neglect this duty, pocket all the fees they can get, and let the Treasury go empty. Now we propose that any clerk who willfully undertakes to cheat the Government in that way by not making honestly the reports the law requires of him shall be turned out of office.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed. The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to compel the performance of certain duties by clerks of courts of the United States.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 154) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain tribes of Indians in the northern superintendency," approved June 10, 1872.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I very much desire that we should conclude the business we had up in yesterday's morning hour. I must object to taking up that bill at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The resolution which was up yesterday should be disposed of this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I move now to proceed to the consideration of the resolution in the case of Mr. Sykes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will state the question.

The CHIEF CLERK. The original resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Francis W. Sykes, late contestant from the State of Alabama, out of the appropriations for compensation and mileage for Senators, the sum of $8,374.80, being the salary of a Senator from the 4th day of March, 1873, to the 28th day of May, 1874, inclusive.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] proposed to amend by striking out "$8,374.80, being the salary of a Senator from the 4th day of March, 1873, to the 28th day of May, 1874, inclusive," and inserting "$3,000." It is now proposed to amend the amendment by striking out "$3,000" and inserting "$6,500."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Although an amendment is not now in order, for convenience I give notice that when it is in order I shall offer an amendment the substance of which is that the actual expenses necessarily incurred both by Mr. SPENCER and Mr. Sykes in the recent contest for a seat in the Senate be paid, which expenses shall be presented, itemized, and verified by the oath of said SPENCER and Sykes respectively, and the amount audited by the Committee of the Senate on Contingent Expenses.

The yeas and nays were taken on the amendment of Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, to the amendment of Mr. CARPENTER; and resulted—yeas 25, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Ramsey, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Sargent, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Wadleigh, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Clayton, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Hitchcock, Jones, Lewis, Robertson, Schurz, Scott, Spencer, Stevenson, and West—16.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONKLING. I now offer as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the resolution the proposition which I send to the Chair, which is to pay the actual expenses necessarily incurred in this contest, to be audited by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin to insert $3,000 is now in order, and should be first put as it is in the nature of a motion to perfect the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. I would inquire if I may of the Senator from Wisconsin whether he is not willing to accept this amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Perhaps being in the chair I cannot withdraw the amendment; but I will put the question to the Senate. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The question being put, the amendment was declared to be rejected.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I offer the amendment which I send to the Chair as a substitute——

Mr. SARGENT. I am in favor of the amendment moved by the Senator from Wisconsin. I should like to have a division on the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question again on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to insert $3,000.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to know what is the alternative proposition. This is to give $3,000.

Mr. CONKLING. I will say to the Senator that my proposed amendment is to pay to each of these parties the expenses actually incurred in this contest for counsel fees and otherwise, to treat them both alike and indemnify them both against their actual expenses, whether they be more or less.

Mr. ANTHONY. My experience of the profession of which my friend is so brilliant an ornament is that we had better pay $3,000 than pay counsel fees.

Mr. CONKLING. But the present proposition is to pay the contestant a sum arbitrarily fixed which may be more or less than his expenses, and to pay nothing to the holder of the seat. My suggestion is this: the contestant being the moving party, the occupant of the seat having been declared by the Senate entitled to it, the contest not having been made by him but forced upon him, if expenses are to be paid it is at least as equitable that he should be indemnified as it is to indemnify the moving party who, of his own option and accord, made the contest, and who the Senate has declared was not entitled to the seat. In other words, if I may be allowed the analogy, if some defeated competitor of the Senator from Rhode Island should come here to contest his seat, thus casting upon him the duty of defending the seat, and he does so, and the Senate adjudges that he was entitled to the seat and bound to maintain and defend his title, if expenses are to be paid, it would be capricious to say that the contestant alone shall be paid and the Senator himself shall shoulder the burden which has been imposed upon him. My amendment proposes to pay both alike whatever they have expended in money in fairly conducting the contest.

Mr. SARGENT. I certainly desire in matters like this to do that which is equitable; but I think we are setting a new precedent entirely; we are taking a new departure. I believe it is the fact that never in this body or in the other House has an instance heretofore occurred where we have paid to the successful contestant the expenses of his contest. If this is so, and I think I am entirely accurate in so saying, we ought to hesitate before starting such a new rule. I do not believe that we had better take the departure at this time, certainly not off-hand as is proposed by the amendment and without the report of a committee. I therefore hope that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, which probably is about the amount of cost to the party who was unsuccessful in making his contest, will be adopted. I believe that it is right that where a person comes to contest a seat in good faith (and it is assumed in this case that the contest was in good faith) that he should be reimbursed his actual necessary expenses. I do not think, however, that we ought to pay him the salary of the whole term, or a large proportion of the whole term; but that there should be simply an equitable adjustment in his favor of the actual expenses of his contest. Believing that $3,000 will probably cover this, I vote for that amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. How about the other party to the contest?

Mr. SARGENT. My answer is that it never has been done from the foundation of the Government to the present time, and I am not disposed to charge the Treasury under a new rule without the report of a committee and without more time for consideration than we are likely to have in the morning hour. Therefore I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from New York be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The suggested amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from New York is to strike out all after the word "resolved" in the first line and to insert:

That the actual expenses necessarily incurred both by Mr. SPENCER and Mr. Sykes, in the recent contest for a seat in the Senate, be paid, which expenses shall bepresented, itemized, and verified by the oath of said SPENCER and Sykes respectively, and the amounts audited by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senate has at this session, on recommendation of the Judiciary Committee, postponed indefinitely I believe—certainly we so recommended, and I think it was postponed indefinitely by unanimous consent—a bill to pay a judge of the supreme court of the District of Columbia the expenses and counsel fees that were incurred by him in defending himself against a wrongful suit brought by some person whose name in the course of his judicial duty he was obliged to strike from the rolls. He did it in good faith. He was sued. He defended himself in order to defend the majesty of the law, as it is stated by himself and his friends, and succeeded. He was right. But we determined that we could not pay a judge of the United States who defended himself from wrongful suits brought by citizens of the United States against him in the performance of his duty; that that was one of the risks which a judge took when he took the office, just as we all take our own risks when we take any office, of defending ourselves against any illegal assaults of other persons. If in the exercise of our duty, in carrying out the will of the Government, we commit a private wrong against a man, which is right as between us and the Government but which is wrong as to him, then we are to be indemnified; the citizen gets his redress and we get our indemnity for all the cost and trouble to which we have been subjected. Everybody can understand that.

Upon what principle, therefore, is it, applied to this case, that we are to say that a person holding the office of Senator shall be entitled to be paid out of the public Treasury for his expenses and counsel fees in defending his right to perform the duties that the law has authorized him to perform? I do not see how we can do it unless we overset all the distinctions that have hitherto been thought to be wise in such respects. I am not saying at this moment that we ought to pay the counsel fees of the other man either; but I am now merely speaking of the case of the person who is rightfully here as a Senator. Suppose that you, sir, or I should happen to be sued by somebody for some remark made as a Senator; suppose one of us should happen to be sued for some remark made in the debate yesterday which if said out of this Chamber would subject us to an action unless we could prove that it was true. I do not make exactly the proper definition, but I will not take the time of the Senate to define precisely where the law of libel begins and ends in respect to a charge that might be made. We defend on the ground that the Constitution protects us for words spoken in debate. At the end of the lawsuit we succeed. The person who sued us in his own county found a judge and a jury who decided in his favor. We had to take it to the Supreme Court. By and by we succeed. Is it to be said that the Senate is to turn around and say that the Treasury has got to indemnify everybody for the expense he is put to in defending himself in the exercise of his legal rights? We cannot do that. It appears to me it is a very dangerous step to take. It appears to me it does not stand on sound principle. Therefore I move to strike out that part of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from New York is not yet before the Senate. The question is on the amendment to insert $3,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon of the Chair. I asked that the amendment might be read, and I supposed that the amendment which was read was pending. If not, I withdraw my observations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The observations will be in order when that amendment is reached.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I should like to have the amendment which is pending read.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I think the proper measure of compensation is what the contestant would have been entitled to if he had been admitted to a seat as salary, and I believe that he is so entitled upon principle as well as justice and according to precedent. It will not be denied that it is necessary that contests in some cases should be made, not simply in the interest of the contestant, but in the interest of the public as well. It is true there might be a case in which a party would contest when there was no reasonable ground for it. In such a case he ought not to have any compensation at all. But where there is reasonable ground for contest, in the interest of the contestant himself and in the interest of the public as well, there it becomes necessary that he should attend Congress for the purpose of seeing the right established, of seeing the voice and will and judgment of the people at the ballot-box or through the Legislature effectuated. His presence is necessary; his efforts are necessary in that behalf.

In this case it is not denied that there was reasonable ground for contest. The Senate has been told by Senators of the committee who investigated this matter, of both sides of politics, that there was reasonable and proper ground for contest. There was great doubt in the minds of the committee how they should decide. They did, however, decide in favor of the Senator who now occupies the seat; so that that question is out of the way.

It appears then that this contestant ought to have been here, that he ought to have made the contest, that he ought to have done exactly what he has done. If that is so, pray what is the reason why the measure of his compensation is not exactly that which he would have received if he had been admitted to the seat which is now occupied by the sitting Senator? If he receives that compensation, if that is his measure of compensation, he is upon exact equality with the Senator who occupies the seat. The Senator who occupies the seat has been at the expense of this contest. That was his misfortune. The contestant has been at the expense of this contest. It was his misfortune that he happened to be at that expense for his own interest as well as that of the public. He is entitled to the compensation he would have received if he had been here as a member. The sitting member is entitled to the compensation by reason of the law which gives it to him. They are upon an exact equality. This is principle, this is justice, this is according to every precedent I believe that has been set in the history of the Government; and therefore I say the proposition of the Senator from Maryland is the true and just and equitable one, and the one which accords with the precedents set by the Government from the earliest period of its existence.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] well says that this is a new departure. It is a departure from the precedents, but the Senate has already departed from the precedents by voting down the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Maryland, which would give to this contestant what would have been his salary if he had been seated on the first day of the term, as he claimed the right to be. I said yesterday all that I desire to say upon that subject, and will only briefly refer to it again.

It seems to me that the idea of compensation by the rule of salary is an unjust one. It is conceded that such have been the precedents. We are departing from precedents wherever we think the public good requires it. We yesterday changed the revenue laws which had existed for eighty years, because the public good required it. We are certainly at liberty to change the precedents in the Senate if right reason requires it. The principle on which we are proceeding——

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me to remind the Senator that the point of my objection is that this is not the report of any committee; it is not done with deliberation, but hastily during the morning hour. When we slaughtered the revenue law, as I am sorry to say we did, it was after long investigation by a committee.

Mr. CARPENTER. There is nothing about this matter that needs examination by a committee. The whole subject is patent to observation. It is conceded that the precedents are in favor of paying the salary. What is the right principle to be adopted? It certainly is to indemnify the contestant if he has made a contest in good faith. The rule of salary may do it and a great deal more, or it may utterly fail to do it. It is therefore not a proper rule. Hence it seems to me that the more correct and fair way is to say that he shall have his expenses whatever they may be. They may exceed what he would be entitled to as a salary; they may fall short; but whatever they are, they ought to be paid. And it is the principle of indemnity which has been recognized all through the precedents, although the rule of damages, so to speak, has been a vicious one; it has been one that had no relation to the damage actually suffered. It was an inflexible rule, having no relation to the end in view. It seems to me, therefore, there can be no question that the rule suggested by the amendment of the Senator from New York is the proper one as to the contestant.

Is there any objection to applying it to the Senator whose seat has been contested? The Senator may be and probably is at much less expense. He is here attending to his duties, and he has no expense of coming here; but if he has been compelled to subpœna witnesses at his own expense, if he has employed counsel, his claim stands, so far as I can see, in just as high an equity as the contestant's. The compensation which he receives as a Senator is not to indemnify him for this contest. If it is right to compensate, that is to indemnify, the contestant, it seems to me it is equally so to compensate the Senator who is seated, and I can see no reason why both should not be paid the reasonable and necessary expenses they have been subjected to in contesting this election.

It is not merely a question of private right; it is a question which the people of the whole country are concerned in; and if we once set the opposite rule and say that no man who makes a contest for a seat shall be indemnified unless he succeeds, in half the instances in which contestants have succeeded, it is very likely a contest never would have been made. To require a man to come from Georgia or Louisiana and contest a seat in this body in Washington and then pay him nothing unless he happens to succeed, will discourage very much the investigation of these cases which ought to be investigated. I see nothing whatever in the suggestion that it will provoke contests. If there is a reasonable doubt about any man's seat, it should be contested. If not, the contest is in bad faith and will not be compensated. The public good requires that really doubtful cases should be settled. No man should sit in this Chamber save with a perfect title, and if there is doubt about any man's title I will always vote to investigate it.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, it is very hard for me to realize the facility of the Senator from New York in proposing the amendment which he has submitted to the resolution which was originally introduced, and I rise (for I wish some information on this subject) to know whether it is with the consent of the Senator from Alabama that he here applies to the Senate and asks that he shall be compensated for the expense incurred by him in defending his title to a seat in this body?

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Propriety perhaps would restrain the Senator from Alabama, if he were present, from responding to that question. In his absence justice requires that I should say that I have never exchanged a word with the Senator from Alabama touching this amendment. He would not be entitled by decorum of parliamentary law to vote upon it. I did not feel bound to consult him. In short, I do not think he has anything to do with the judgment of the Senate on this point.

Mr. ALCORN. So I supposed was the fact of the case; and I suppose that the Senator from New York in no event, if he were situated as the Senator from Alabama is situated to-day, would accept from the Government of the United States compensation for the expenses that he had incurred in defending his title to a seat in this body; nor do I suppose there is a single Senator on the floor of the Senate to-day who would allow himself to be placed in the humiliating attitude of coming here and asking the Senate for compensation for expenses of this sort, contrary to all precedent and to every usage that has characterized this Government from its foundation down to the present time.

The contestant from Alabama stands in a different attitude. All precedent authorizes him to come here and ask that he may be treated as those have been treated who have come here before and who have gone away from this body unsuccessful in the contests they have made for seats in the Senate. For fruitless cases, contests that are made for the purpose of annoyance, for the purpose of protracting and harassing, there should be no compensation made; but in a well-founded case like the present, the Senate has never refused to make compensation to the unsuccessful contestant.

Now, sir, the principle of compensation is fixed. It is not the purpose of the Constitution to make compensation to Senators and Representatives here for anything more than their expenses; and we go forward upon the idea that the mileage and salary we receive is no more than a compensation for the expenses that members of Congress are put to when they come here. That compensation is made to the person who holds his seat, to the successful contestant. He holds these expenses that are guaranteed to him by the usages of this body and by the law of this body; but the unsuccessful contestant claims no more than his expenses; and the best way to arrive at what his expenses are, without defrauding him on the one hand or permitting the Government to be wronged on the other, is to take that compensation which in the judgment of the nation is sufficient for the expenses of a Senator and give him that for his expenses, no more and no less. You have the judgment of the nation that this is a fair compensation for expenses, and that is what he asks, without itemizing his account.

If the Senator from Alabama, the successful contestant, is tacked on here, I shall vote against the resolution as unjust, however hard it may operate upon the unsuccessful contestant here.

Mr. MORTON. I deem it to be my duty to move to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the report of the conference committee on the currency bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can finish this matter in ten minutes.

Mr. MORTON. I think not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves to postpone the pending and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the conference report to which he has referred.

Mr. ALCORN. If no one else desires to debate this question——

Mr. MORTON. It will be debated further.

Mr. ALCORN. Then I have nothing to say.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend for a moment. The Chair will state that through inadvertence he allowed the expiration of the morning hour to pass. By unanimous consent given yesterday the Chair was to call up as the unfinished business at the expiration of the morning hour to-day the bills reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. The Chair did not observe when the morning hour expired and did not make the call. The Chair makes this announcement, and will now put the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the motion is put, I desire to say that although I am very anxious to have the business attended to which the Senate was so kind as to give me to-day for the purpose of considering, yet I think I cannot with propriety resist the motion made by the Senator from Indiana, inasmuch as this conference report has been made to the Senate by the unanimous consent of the Senate committee, and it being upon a subject that has been before Congress ever since the commencement of the present session, I deem it more worthy of the time of the Senate than the bills that are reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. For that reason, with the statement that I shall ask, subsequent to the action of the Senate on this report, for the same courtesy that was extended to me before, I will yield to this conference report, and think it proper to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 529) to authorize an appointment in the Inspector-General's Department;

A bill (S. No. 533) granting a pension to Uriah W. Briggs;

A bill (S. No. 624) to authorize the issuance of patents for lands granted to the State of Oregon in certain cases;

A bill (S. No. 658) granting a pension to Martin V. Jackson;

A bill (S. No. 693) to change the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Wisconsin at Oshkosh;

A bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay, assignee of the builders of the steamer La Portena, Edward Everett, F. W. Lincoln, Azalia, and N. P. Banks;

A bill (S. No. 793) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the schooner Jennie Spear to that of Santa Rosa; and

A bill (S. No. 870) giving the assent of Congress to the acceptance by the officers of the United States ship Monocacy of silver medals presented to them by the King of Siam.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 876) to amend the law relating to patents, trade-marks, and copyrights, with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3672) authorizing the board of commissioners of the Soldiers' Home to sell the property belonging to the Soldiers' Home, situated at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, and known as Harrodsburgh Springs property; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3517) supplementary to the third section of the act entitled "An act to divide the State of Virginia into two judicial districts."

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3073) to amend section 19 of the act approved August 18, 1856, entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States."

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That Peter Campbell have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

THE CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report has been read.

Mr. MORTON. I ask to have it read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all of the amendment after "that," in the first line, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, shall be hereafter known as "the national-bank act."

SEC. 2. That section 21 of "the national-bank act" be so amended that the several associations therein provided for shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations; but the moneys required by said section to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits, in all respects as provided for in the said section.

SEC. 3. That section 22 of the said act, and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said acts, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and the proviso in the first section of the act approved July 12, 1870, entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," prohibiting the banks hereafter organized a circulation over $500,000; and the proviso in the third section of said act limiting the circulation of banks authorized to issue notes redeemable in gold coin to $1,000,000; and section 6 of said act, relating to the redistribution of twenty-five millions of circulating notes, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; that every association hereafter organized shall be subject to, and be governed by, the rules, restrictions, and limitations, and possess the rights, privileges, and franchises, now or hereafter to be prescribed by law as to national banking associations, with the same power to amend, alter, and repeal provided by "the national-bank act."

SEC. 4. That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act, and of the several acts amendatory thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used for the redemption of such circulation; which sum shall be counted as a part of its lawful reserve, as provided in section 2 of this act; and when the circulating notes of any such associations, assorted or unassorted, shall be presented for redemption, in sums of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, to the Treasurer of the United States, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Treasurer of the United States to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally, on the 1st day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; and whenever such redemptions for any association shall amount to the sum of $500 such association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum in United States notes equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed. And all notes of national banks worn, defaced, mutilated, or otherwise unfit for circulation shall, when received by any assistant treasurer or at any designated depository of the United States, be forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States for redemption as provided herein. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed the circulating notes so redeemed shall be forwarded to the respective associations by which they were issued; but if any of such notes are worn, mutilated, defaced, or rendered otherwise unfit for use they shall be forwarded to the Comptroller of the Currency and destroyed and replaced as now provided by law: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the charges for transportation and the costs for assorting such notes; and the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the cost of engraving such plates as shall be ordered by each association respectively; and the amount assessed upon each association shall be in proportion to the circulation redeemed, and be charged to the fund on deposit with the Treasurer: And provided further, That so much of section 32 of said national-bank act requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this section, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes, in whole or in part, may, upon the deposit of lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $9,000, take up the bonds which said association has on deposit with the Treasurer for the security of such circulating notes; which bonds shall be assigned to the bank in the manner specified in the nineteenth section of the national-bank act; and the outstanding notes of said association, to an amount equal to the legal-tender notes deposited, shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States, and destroyed as now provided by law: Provided, That the amount of the bonds on deposit for circulation shall not be reduced below $50,000.

SEC. 6. That the Comptroller of the Currency shall, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, cause the charter numbers of the association to be printed upon all national-bank notes which may be hereafter issued by him.

SEC. 7. That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $382,000,000, which shall be retired and reduced in the following manner only, to wit: within thirty days after circulating notes to the amount of $1,000,000 shall, from time to time, be issued to national banking associations under this act, in excess of the highest outstanding value thereof at any time prior to such issue, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to three-eighths of the circulating notes so issued, which shall be in reduction of the maximum amount of $382,000,000 fixed by this section; and such reduction shall continue until the maximum amount of United States notes outstanding shall be $300,000,000; and the United States notes so retired shall be canceled and carried to the account of the sinking fund provided for by the second clause of section 5 of the act approved on the 25th of February, 1862, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption and funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," and shall constitute a portion of said sinking fund. And the interest thereon computed at the rate of 5 per cent. shall be added annually to said sinking fund. But if the surplus revenue be not sufficient for this purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, a sufficient amount of the bonds of the United States of the character and description prescribed in this act for United States notes to be then retired and canceled.

SEC. 8. That on and after the 1st day of January, 1878, any holder of United States notes to the amount of fifty dollars, or any multiple thereof, may present them for payment at the office of the Treasurer of the United States, or at the office of the assistant treasurer at the city of New York; and thereupon he shall be entitled to receive, at his option, from the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized and required to issue in exchange for said notes an equal amount of either class of the coupon or registered bonds of the United States provided for in the first section of the act approved on the 14th of July, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and the act amendatory thereof, approved the 20th day of January, 1871, which bonds shall continue to be exempt from taxation as provided in said act: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury in lieu of such bonds may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue the United States notes so received either in exchange for coin at par, or, with the consent of the holder, in the redemption of bonds then redeemable at par, or in the purchase of bonds at not less than par, or to meet the current payments for the public service; and when used to meet current payments an equal amount of the gold in the Treasury shall be applied in redemption of the bonds known as five-twenty bonds.

SEC. 9. That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the principal of the public debt of the United States.

And the Senate agree to the same.

O. P. MORTON,
JOHN SHERMAN,
A. S. MERRIMON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
HORACE MAYNARD,
C. B. FARWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MORTON. I call attention to the fact that there is a misprint; that the word "value" used in section 7 should be "volume;" so that it will read "in excess of the highest outstanding volume." It is right in the engrossed copy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The correction will be made in the print if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senate is so entirely familiar with this subject, there not being a topic in this report that has not been discussed time and again in the hearing of all, that I shall content myself with a simple statement of the changes that have been made by the committee of conference in the bill as it passed the Senate, premising, however, this remark, that this bill is the result of concession and compromise; of a yielding of something on both sides, of a sincere desire to present a measure that should be substantially satisfactory to the country and furnish a settlement of this question, realizing that there is an earnest, and I will say an intense, desire in every part of the United States that such a settlement ought to be had before the adjournment of Congress.

The first change that I shall notice in the bill as it passed the Senate is in regard to the reduction of the legal-tender notes. The bill as it passed the Senate provided that for every $100,000 of national-bank notes which should be issued under it, $25,000, or 25 per cent. of greenbacks, should be retired and canceled. In the bill as presented to the Senate by the report of the Finance Committee, 50 per cent. reduction was proposed. The Senate disagreed to that and made it 25. We have made it 37½ per cent. or three-eighths, just dividing the difference between the report of the Committee on Finance and the bill as it passed the Senate.

As the bill passed the Senate, the legal-tender notes thus to be retired were to be retired by the issue of bonds. That is to say, the Secretary of the Treasury was to sell bonds and thus obtain enough legal-tender notes in that way to make the 25 per cent. reduction, which notes were to be canceled. We have changed that by carrying those notes to the account of the sinking fund, so as to avoid the issue of bonds, but preserving the theory of the sinking fund as it now stands by requiring interest at the rate of 5 per cent. to be calculated on the amount to be added to the sinking fund, so that the effect upon the sinking fund is not changed and the theory of it is preserved. But in the contingency that the sinking fund shall not be sufficient, there being a failing of revenue, to retire and account for all the notes that might have to be retired under the provisions of this act, the report provides that for the balance over and beyond the sinking-fund bonds shall be issued and sold in order to procure the requisite amount of greenbacks to be retired.

We strike out of the Senate bill the third section which, in effect, required the reserves upon deposits to be kept in the vaults of the home banks, making a change of the law in that particular. We strike that out and leave the law as to the reserves on deposits to stand just as it does now and has existed ever since the creation of the national-bank system. In that respect we make no change. The provision in the bill as it passed the Senate requiring the banks to retain one-fourth of their coin interest is stricken out. Reserves on circulation are abolished entirely. The committee was unanimous on that point. The bill still provides as it did before—and in that respect there is no change—that each bank shall keep an amount of legal-tenders equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation in the Treasury for the redemption of such of its notes as may be presented to the Treasury for redemption, and also the worn-out, mutilated, and defaced notes. The only change we make in regard to that is that that 5 per cent. shall be counted as a part of the reserve on deposits. So that in effect the reserves on deposit which the banks are required to keep at home are diminished 5 per cent., and the reserves on circulation abolished entirely.

I might state that that was thought to be a measure which would perhaps afford immediate relief if it were necessary, as a net calculation will show that these provisions taken all together will set free about twenty-six and a half millions of legal-tender notes which the banks are now required to keep in their vaults, and put that additional amount in circulation.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the reserve on circulation, $26,000,000?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. Allow me to ask the Senator from Indiana whether the reserve at home and in the Treasury here is to be in legal-tenders or national-bank notes?

Mr. MORTON. Legal-tenders.

Mr. DAVIS. In both cases?

Mr. MORTON. There is no change made in the law as to the character of the reserve at all. It stands just as it did before, except this 5 per cent. of legal-tender notes that is required to be kept in the Treasury shall be counted as a part of the reserve which the banks are required to keep on their deposits.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. He estimates that twenty-six and a half millions will be set free by repealing the law requiring the reserve to be kept on circulation. I ask whether, in estimating that amount of twenty-six and a half millions, he goes on the hypothesis that in fact the banks will keep no reserve? Would it be safe for a bank to do business without keeping anything to redeem its circulation?

Mr. MORTON. The reserve on circulation I believe, has been regarded from very nearly the first establishment of the national banking system as illogical and unnecessary. The notes are secured by the bonds of the United States. Practically the banks are called upon for redemption very seldom, because there is no occasion for it; there is no inducement for it, and the banks are not practically required to keep on hand legal-tender notes for the redemption of their own bills. That is one of the complaints made that no form of redemption is required, and the 5 per cent. in the Treasury has been presented as a remedy for what was regarded as a defect in the system.

Mr. THURMAN. I infer from what the Senator says that his estimate of twenty-six and a half million includes the entire reserve and goes on the theory that the banks will keep no reserve in respect to circulation.

Mr. MORTON. The banks are not required under this bill to keep any.

Mr. THURMAN. And in practice they will keep no reserves. It is on that theory that the Senator proceeds?

Mr. MORTON. They will keep 5 per cent. in the Treasury of the United States, and are required to do that, and can keep as much as they choose. I will state, from what little knowledge of banking I have, that practically the banks are in the receipt of legal-tender notes in the course of their daily business enough to protect themselves from any bills of their own which may be presented for redemption without being required to set aside any fund for that purpose. I have often heard that stated by national bankers.

Mr. DAVIS. The reports of the country banks generally, which this would particularly affect, show that more than the reserve required by law is kept in their vaults; and they have to do that for self-protection. A check drawn on them to-day for $10,000, or any other amount, must be paid on presentation; and they must also keep enough there to redeem any of their own notes that may be presented to them. The law requires 15 per cent., which is usually kept. Of course there are some instances with some banks where it is not kept.

Mr. MORTON. That is on the deposits, where their notes may be required to be paid in legal-tenders; but so far as redemption is concerned I believe the reports show that the banks are very seldom called upon for redemption, because there is scarcely any inducement to do it, though now and then legal-tenders may be required for a particular purpose.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Indiana whether the estimate he makes that the reserve now held against the circulation amounts to twenty-six and a half millions is the result of an estimate made by the committee from the data in the Department?

Mr. MORTON. That is not the estimate of the committee. I give it as my own, and I will state the basis of it. I may not be entirely accurate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If there be $354,000,000 in circulation and the reserve to meet that is only twenty-six and a half millions, that would be about 7 per cent.

Mr. MORTON. I will state how I understand it. The law requires that the country banks, those outside the redemption cities, shall keep 15 per cent. of reserve. Two-fifths of that amount they are required to keep in their own vaults. Two-fifths is 6 per cent. The other three-fifths in practice they are allowed to keep in the redemption cities, and practically they keep it in New York, and that is in use chiefly in the stock market. Therefore in counting what would be set free I take no account of the three-fifths they keep at New York, but I take account of the 6 per cent. that they are required to keep locked up in their own vaults under the law, if they comply with it. In regard to banks in the redemption cities, they are required to keep 25 per cent. reserve on circulation and 12½ per cent. of it, or one-half, they are required to keep in their own vaults. The other half they may keep in some other redemption city. Therefore I count the two-fifths in that case or 6 per cent., and I count 12½ per cent. in the other case, and taking into consideration how much circulation is issued by the country banks and how much is issued by the banks in the redemption cities, I came to the result of about twenty-six and a half millions. It may not be entirely accurate, but I give the basis of my calculation, and in that I leave out entirely the amount they have been required to keep in the redemption cities, and they have been required to keep it there and get interest upon it as a deposit. They are allowed now to bring that home so far as the reserves on circulation are concerned, and can loan it to the people where they live at a greater percentage than they get by sending it to a redemption city and merely getting interest on it as a deposit. There is another advantage to the people around the bank not obtained by them before.

The bill first passed by the Senate provided that on the 1st of July, 1878, the holders of legal-tender notes should have the right to present them at the Treasury and receive in exchange for them at par a 4½ per cent. bond. The time has been changed. The original bill as reported by the Committee on Finance put the time of this conversion at the 1st of January, 1877. The Senate thought that was too soon and changed it to the 1st of July, 1878, making it a year and a half longer. In the compromise we have again changed the time, and we have put it on the 1st of January, 1878, being three and one-half years off. There was a number of reasons given for this. I can only state that in putting the time off to the 1st of January, 1878, instead of the 1st of January, 1877, we thought we were acting at least upon the safe side; that even if it should turn out that specie payments, so-called, could be resumed on the 1st of January, 1877, there were grave doubts whether the time was not too short, and whether the change would not be too sudden; and it was thought to be safer and better, and that but little inconvenience could come from it, to put the time off until the 1st of January, 1878.

The theory of the bill is that the greenbacks will gradually approach to par, that the change in value will be about at the rate of 3½ per annum, will be so small and so gradual as to occasion no jar, no derangement in business, no disaster, will go on so gently that no interest in the country will be severely or dangerously affected by it. If the time had been fixed sooner, the change would be more abrupt, and great apprehensions were entertained, as has often been expressed on this floor, that serious disasters would result from it.

We have put the maximum amount of greenbacks at $382,000,000, which is now the amount in circulation. This was in the Senate bill. We have added to that clause a provision that they shall not be retired except as provided in this bill.

We have changed the character of the bond into which the holders of legal-tender notes have the right to convert them on the 1st of January, 1878. As the bill passed the Senate the bond was made a 4½ per cent. bond. This bill provides that those notes may be converted at the option of the holder into any one of the three bonds provided for by the act of 1870. That act provided for a 5 per cent. bond running ten years, a 4½ per cent. bond running longer, and a 4 per cent. bond running still longer. This bill authorizes the holder of the greenback to convert his greenback into any one of these three bonds at his option.

The theory of the bill proceeds upon the ground that a 5 per cent. bond into which he has a right to convert his legal-tender note will be at par in gold on the 1st of January, 1878. It has been continually argued by the Senator from Ohio, the able chairman of the Finance Committee, and by many others, that a 5 per cent. bond was at par throughout the world. It was argued on the floor here by Senators that a 4½ per cent. bond would be at par on the 1st of January, 1878, and I believe Senators generally took it for granted that a 5 per cent. bond would be at par at that time. If so, then the legal-tender notes which are authorized to be converted into that bond at par will themselves be worth par, because whatever may be converted into a bond at par must and will be naturally equal to that bond. If therefore a 5 per cent. bond is at par on the 1st of January, 1878, the legal-tender notes will have gradually approached par, and if equal in value to the gold coin in the Treasury, will be equivalent to gold and can be used as an equivalent for gold by the Treasury of the United States.

The concluding clause of the eighth section we have changed from the Senate bill, although I do not think it has been changed so as to affect the meaning very much. As it stood before it said that—

> The Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue the United States notes so received, or, if they are canceled, shall issue United States notes to the same amount, either to purchase or redeem the public debt at par in coin or to meet the current payments for the public service.

It has been changed to this form:

> And the Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue the United States notes so received either in exchange for coin at par, or, with the consent of the holder, in the redemption of bonds then redeemable at par, or in the purchase of bonds at not less than par, or to meet the current payments for the public service; and when used to meet current payments an equal amount of the gold in the Treasury shall be applied in redemption of the bonds known as five-twenty bonds.

Mr. President, I have now gone over the changes that have been made by the committee of conference as I remember them. There may be some verbal changes that it is not material to call the attention of the Senate to, and as I have no desire to take up time or to make a speech, I shall not say anything further.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question before he concludes. If it will not be inconvenient, I wish him to take the eighth section of the report—I refer to that which precedes the proviso—and read it so far as may be necessary to enable him to explain precisely what it means.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator calls my attention to the first clause of the eighth section:

> That on and after the 1st day of January, 1878, any holder of United States notes to the amount of fifty dollars, or any multiple thereof—

I believe we made the bond smaller so as to bring it more nearly within the reach of everybody. We make it a fifty-dollar bond, or any multiple thereof—> may present them for payment at the office of the Treasurer of the United States, or at the office of the assistant treasurer at the city of New York; and thereupon he shall be entitled to receive, at his option, from the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized and required to issue in exchange for said notes, an equal amount of either class of the coupon or registered bonds of the United States provided for in the first section of the act approved on the 14th of July, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and the act amendatory thereof, approved the 20th day of January, 1871, which bonds shall continue to be exempt from taxation as provided in said act: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury in lieu of such bonds may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States.

What is the particular point?

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the Senator to state what the option is there referred to and what the presentor of notes is to receive?

Mr. MORTON. The option is as to the character of the bond. He may prefer a ten-year 5 per cent. bond, or as an investment he may prefer a 4½ per cent. bond running longer, or he may prefer a 4 per cent. bond running still longer. Men sometimes differ upon those points. This was put in there for the purpose of meeting that view.

Mr. CONKLING. What is he to receive? Where is the provision here under which he is to receive anything and what is he to receive?

Mr. MORTON. "An equal amount of either class of the coupon or registered bonds;" that is, an amount equal to the greenbacks, the legal-tender notes, that he presents. He is to receive bonds equal in amount to the notes which he presents, provided they amount to fifty dollars or a multiple thereof.

Mr. CONKLING. Then if I understand the Senator the words "entitled to receive" refer to an equal amount of either class of bonds?

Mr. MORTON. Yes; bonds equal in amount to the legal-tender notes he presents.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the only hesitation I had in signing this conference report was the fear that those Senators who with me had voted steadily for securing and maintaining a specie standard as soon as practicable would not be entirely satisfied with the report. So far as my own judgment goes, and from my knowledge of the whole history and progress of this bill, I am entirely content with the report. I believe it is a fair compromise and will secure what those who have voted with me have all along contended for, the maintenance of a specie standard and specie payments after the 1st day of January, 1878. I regarded the establishment by Congress, especially by the concession of all parties and all parts of this Congress, of this policy of a specie standard on and after the 1st of January, 1878, as so important that I was very willing to yield on all minor points; and now in the brief remarks that I shall make on this bill I wish to call the attention of the Senate mainly to the points which affect that primary and fundamental condition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question before he goes on further, that I may understand him?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator speaks of coming to the specie standard, the specie basis of payment, in 1878. Do I understand this report aright, that that specie payment in1878 is to be at the option of the debtor, the option of the Government, and not at the will of the holder of United States notes?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer that in the progress of my remarks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, let us examine this bill. The eighth section provides:

That on and after the 1st day of January, 1878, any holder of United States notes to the amount of fifty dollars or any multiple thereof, may present them for payment at the office of the Treasurer of the United States, or at the office of the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, and thereupon he shall be entitled to receive at his option from the Secretary of the Treasury an equal amount of either class of the coupon or registered bonds of the United States, provided for in the first section of the act approved on the 14th of July, 1870.

In other words, this confers, as plainly as the English language can do it, upon the holders of all these notes the right to present them on a day named and thereafter and receive an equal amount of the gold bonds of the United States of the character described in the act of 1870, known as the refunding act, and of which already some $300,000,000 have been sold under unfavorable circumstances at par in coin. It authorizes any holder of a note to receive that which during the history of our country, during nine-tenths of its existence, has been equivalent to coin, which by the market value of our securities to-day is equivalent to coin, which in the ordinary course of events, probably as long as our flag shall wave over a united country, and probably at all times except in a state of war, will be at par with the specie standard, or equivalent to gold coin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I interrupt the Senator by asking a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. O, no; I will answer it with pleasure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator, merely for information, whether any holder of greenbacks hitherto in respect to these new five per cents could not turn those greenbacks into 5 per cents, they being at par, at any time by going and buying them?

Mr. SHERMAN. He could not. The holder of United States notes might buy these bonds, but the notes would only be received at a depreciation, that is, the notes would not be received at par for an equal amount of bonds. He could not take a given amount of greenbacks and present them and receive an equal amount of bonds in exchange.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the bonds were only at par?

Mr. SHERMAN. But that is not the condition of values. Since the war the bonds have been above par in greenbacks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator misunderstands me. I am speaking of the new 5 per cents into which they are entitled to turn the greenbacks in 1878. The Senator thinks $300,000,000 of them have already been disposed of at par.

Mr. SHERMAN. At par in coin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that the holder of the greenback so far could not get his pay on his dollar unless he paid up the premium difference between that and the coin. Is that it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. Now, the holder of greenbacks might present them to the Treasury of the United States in payment of a bond, but he would only be allowed for his greenback about eighty-nine cents or its equivalent in gold in payment of that bond. If he will present coin, he can buy the bond at par; if he presents greenbacks, he would have to present $1.11 and a fraction over, according to the present standard value of the currency. The object of this section is to advance the value of that greenback to the standard of gold.

Now, Mr. President, the point upon which we had the most difficulty in this matter was not as to the phraseology or meaning of these words, but first as to what should be done with the notes received by the Treasury of the United States for bonds? That was one of the great points of controversy in the committee of conference, and another was the time for redemption fixed in this section. If these notes must be reissued at once when they were received under the mandatory provision of the bill as it stood when it was sent from the Senate to the House, it might be that the Secretary of the Treasury would be compelled to reissue these notes at a time when there was a glut in the market and no need of currency, and thus depreciate the value of the note. On the other hand, it was urged with considerable force that if the bill stood as it was reported from the Committee on Finance and the power to reissue these notes was simply a discretionary power with the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary might abuse that power, or would have too great a power over the currency of the country; that he might refuse to issue and reissue these notes under circumstances when the public weal demanded it. Therefore there was, on the one hand, a danger that the compulsory feature of the section as it was sent by the Senate to the House might compel the reissue of these notes imprudently, and on the other hand that the absolute power in the Secretary to issue these notes at his pleasure or to refuse to issue them might confer upon him a dangerous power. The committee of conference, in my judgment, have made a wise and correct compromise. They have defined the purposes for which alone these notes may be reissued, and the power to reissue being thus limited and defined will inevitably maintain them at the standard of par in gold or par in bonds.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator, unfortunately I think, as it might mislead, has used the term "may reissue." As I read it, the bill says the Secretary of the Treasury "shall reissue the United States notes."

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; he shall reissue. It is mandatory; but the purposes for which that issue may be made are clearly and distinctly defined. What are they?

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue the United States notes so received either in exchange for coin at par—

That is the ordinary process on which a Bank of England note is issued. It is never issued except for gold at par. Anybody who presents coin or bullion at par can get a Bank of England note. So it is with our coin certificates issued daily. They are nothing but paper money issued on a deposit of coin—or, with the consent of the holder, in the redemption of bonds then redeemable at par—

The whole of the five-twenty bonds, $1,000,000,000 of them, are now redeemable at par, and this section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue these notes in the payment of those bonds to any one willing to receive them instead of coin. So when the ten-forties mature they will be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States at par in coin, or, with the consent of the holder, in United States notes at par—or in the purchase of bonds at not less than par, or to meet—

Here is the clause upon which criticism is most likely to be made, but I think it is fairly met by the language used:

Or to meet the current payments for the public service; and when used to meet current payments an equal amount of the gold in the Treasury shall be applied in redemption of the bonds known as five-twenty bonds.

We all know now that we have a surplus of nearly one hundred millions of coin revenue. The revenues in coin reach the sum of two hundred millions. We have to pay for interest on the public debt one hundred millions, leaving one hundred millions which may now be sold for currency or may be applied to the purchase or payment of bonds. If, therefore, one hundred millions of notes flow into the Treasury under the operations of this bill and one hundred millions of 5 per cent. bonds are issued in the redemption of the notes, then the notes shall be reissued under these circumstances, for the payment of current expenses, and the coin used directly to pay the bonds commonly known as five-twenties, and this makes a rapid refunding of the public debt in pursuance of the express provision of the law of 1870.

Hitherto by means of a syndicate of bankers, and at a large cost, we have sold three hundred millions of 5 per cent. bonds for coin and with this coin have paid three hundred millions of 6 per cent. bonds. And we have sold the surplus gold for our own notes at large depreciation, and thus have supplied the deficiency in our currency revenue. Under this bill the surplus gold is at once applied to the payment of 6 per cent. bonds now redeemable, and our deficiency in currency revenue will be supplied by currency coming into the Treasury for 5 per cent. bonds. It is scarcely probable that the conversion of notes into 5 per cent. bonds will reach fifty millions a year; but to whatever extent it is carried, even to the whole amount of our 6 per cent. bonds, or $1,000,000,000, it will furnish an easy, simple mode of converting our 6 per cent. bonds into those bearing a less rate of interest, and that without cost, syndicate, or mystery.

But, sir, the great object accomplished by this section is that our notes after January, 1878, will no longer be dishonored, depreciated, daily sold at 10 to 15 per cent. below par in coin though they are payable in coin. These notes will then be at par with 5 per cent. bonds, and thus in effect be made par in coin and will be received and paid out as coin.

Again, Mr. President, if my construction of this section is correct, here is an absolute pledge by the United States of America, made now after a long controversy, a pledge that is not likely to be broken, that on the 1st day of January, 1878, we shall have reached the specie standard under provisions by which that specie standard can be maintained. I consider it of the very highest public importance to have that declaration made. Now, sir, why should it not be made? And here I come directly to the point mentioned by the Senator from Vermont. He says there is not the right on the part of the holder of the notes to demand coin. That is true. The option is with the Secretary of the Treasury to issue either the bonds or to pay in coin. The option is with the holder of the note to demand either kind of bonds; but it is at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay either in bonds or in coin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that the way the greenback reads?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator asks me if that is the way the greenback reads. If we cannot pay absolutely in coin, ought we not to do the next best thing? Because we cannot pay in coin absolutely at a day named, shall we therefore refuse to give to the holder of those notes any promise to pay him in the future?

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How can the Senator say that if we cannot pay in coin we can pay in the next best thing, when he has just stated that we have $100,000,000 of surplus coin every year which we can use to take up the five-twenty bonds? If we mean to keep the faith of the Government, why do we not use that to pay the notes that are promises to pay on demand?

Mr. SHERMAN. Simply because under the operations of our laws, as they are now administered, we must sell the gold to pay our current expenses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then we should increase the public debt if we did not redeem the bonds.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here is the position in which we are placed: Gentlemen who demand specie payment literally without conditions or qualifications insist upon that which is unattainable at this moment and are not willing to accept that which is attainable, and which is equivalent to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator is speaking of me, he is mistaken. I will define my position. I beg the Senator not to define it in that way, because it is not correct.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is inclined to catechise me as I go along with a simple explanation of this report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did it with the consent of my friend. I certainly would not have interrupted him without his consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now to come back to this section: it does provide what all who have voted with me have been contending for, a specie standard at as early a day as practicable. Here you have that equivalent; and if perchance this is not the full specie standard, what is to prevent Congress from adopting the requisite measures hereafter when the assent of Congress can be obtained for the accumulation of coin, or for taking any other step necessary to actually maintain coin redemption on and after the 1st of January, 1878? I appeal to Senators who have a grave responsibility upon them, is it not now advisable to secure the declaration of a public policy to make what we aim at in that way as sure as the march of time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have made that declaration three times already, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I was about to ask the Senator why he does not propose the redemption or the conversion of United States notes into bonds at an early date, as on the 1st of January, 1875 or 1876?

Mr. SHERMAN. Having secured by the concessions made the fixed policy of a specie standard—because it must be remembered in this matter that these are concessions made by both Houses—then the question came up on the point of time. Now, sir, I believe——

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator one question in connection with the remark he has just made. I should like to know by whom that concession has been made. This House and the other House by a majority are inflationists, using that word for convenience, and I should like to know who made the concession when both Houses agreed on that point? Who has conceded?

Mr. SHERMAN. I say that the majority of both Houses have largely conceded to those who believe that it is our primary obligation to maintain a specie standard.

The question then came up with regard to the point of time. The Senate had fixed as the time the 1st day of July, 1878. The House had agreed to that date. Neither of those measures allowed the conversion of greenbacks into a bond bearing 5 per cent.; and neither of them contained the provisions I have read in regard to the reissue of notes. Now, when this, as I may say, immutable specie standard was conceded and the question came on the point of time, I insisted upon fixing the 1st day of January, 1877, as the day of redemption.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In asking the question I did not intend to express any opinion. I desire to know upon what ground the committee agreed to 1878 rather than January 1875 or 1876, or some earlier date.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that to the Senator. It is manifest that if you were to fix the 1st of January, 1875, for the redemption of the bonds, you would at once appreciate the value of your notes 11 per cent. That would give but six months, and that would pile upon the debtors in this country upon contracts made on existing values an additional burden of 11 per cent.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That is the reason, as I understand the Senator. Now, then, we are in the presence of a condition of things which we can comprehend. That condition being such that we do not dare to take the step now which this committee advise us to take three years hence, I ask the Senator from Ohio and the committee what knowledge they now have with reference to the condition of things that will exist in 1876 or 1877 on which they base the opinion, which is at the foundation of this bill, by which they advise the Senate and the country to take a step they do not dare to take now because they know it goes upon a basis which it is not in the power of any man to foreshadow; that is, we are asked to do in 1878 a thing which we dare not do to-day, upon the assumption of a different condition of things then from that which exists now. I ask for the evidence on which that difference rests.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is the Senator from Massachusetts opposed to coin redemption on the 1st of January, 1878, or to legislating in that direction?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will express my opinion about that when I come to address the Senate on the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I hope the Senator will allow me to express mine.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But I ask for the evidence which influenced the committee to advise a measure based upon a condition of things in 1877 or 1878, which measure they do not dare to advise upon a condition of things which actually exists before their eyes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts now discloses that he does not think this country can reach specie payments on the 1st of January, 1878, and therefore this bill is too operative for him to indorse, because, forsooth, it may create trouble at that time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the Senator will state the reasons which govern him, I will undertake to tell the Senator the reasons that govern me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I state the reasons now, that I believe the United States of America have the power to redeem and the ability to redeem in two years from this time. I believe that if the word were spoken and the fiat made all the timid fears of these gentlemen who are afraid to take an affirmative policy on anything of this kind would be dissipated like the idle wind. But when I cannot have it done in two or three years, I am willing to do it in three years and a half. I wish to pledge the faith of the United States that it shall be done at the earliest day I can name, and not to fritter away the golden opportunity now. I do it upon my faith in the power, the wealth, the integrity, and the ability of the United States to redeem it. And more than all, upon my confidence in the sincerity and good faith of those who join me in making the pledge contained in this bill, and upon my knowledge that no such pledge made by Congress in the name of the people has ever been violated.

Now, Mr. President, to come back to the point of time, here was a tender point. When this section was so modified as to secure a fixed plan of resumption, simple and effective, and the question of time came up, I insisted for more than a week upon the 1st of January, 1877, mainly because I thought the administration that had made the pledge to redeem these notes in coin at the earliest day practicable should redeem that pledge within their allotted period. I would be glad to do it in that time. I wish Congress would join now in hastening this day. I believe the time fixed is too remote. But, sir, when the great object was attained by these modifications, was I to haggle about the time or to stand upon that?

But now I will state to the honorable Senator in direct answer to his question that I believe we can maintain this resumption from and after the 1st of January, 1877; but some of the ablest and best business men of this country, including members of both Houses of Congress, Senators and members, feared that if the attempt was made too soon we would meet the same fate that was met in England when after the great wars with Napoleon they attempted to resume, and resumed too soon, and then the time was postponed too far. There was therefore some strength in the argument that to fix too early a day might defeat the very object had in view. If I had my way in all this matter, I would fix the time as originally proposed by the Committee on Finance, the 1st of January, 1877. I think within two and a half years we could undoubtedly reach the specie standard and maintain it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; but all these questions cut up what I intended to be a brief explanation, very much.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator is unwilling to yield to a question, of course I will not press it. I beg him not to do it against his will.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to inquire, speaking of what England did, whether they waited as long as we have already waited in the first place, and in the second place, that I need not interrupt him by another question immediately, whether when they did come to resume it was a resumption like this at the option of the debtor, the government, instead of saying that the money should be paid on demand of the person who held the paper?

Mr. SHERMAN. It must be said to the honor of the English people that they brought about absolute redemption I think in about six or seven years after the war with Napoleon was over. But, sir, we have not done it, and I am sorry for it. For years I have been struggling to fix a time when resumption should be brought about; but we have never yet got a majority of Congress to come to the point of fixing a time; and now when a majority of both Houses are prepared to fix a day when they will resume specie payments, we are met, forsooth, by those who want to resume specie payments sooner or on some different terms, and are not satisfied with what is practicable and attainable, but wish to attain something more. Senators, defeat this measure, which pledges the faith of the nation, which has never been violated, to a particular policy and to a day which is fixed for the resumption of specie payments, and when will you bring about this hoped-for result? At the beginning of this Administration, in March, 1869, we promised to pay the United States notes in coin at as early a day as practicable. We have never been able to fix the day. Now here is a proposition in which the time, the place, and the manner are fixed; and because forsooth there are some details in it that do not suit or because the time is too remote, there is hesitation about adopting it.

When I consented to this report I yielded my own convictions on the point of time, because I believed the time ought to have been fixed on the 1st of January, 1877. But when after several consultations it was perfectly manifest that unless I would yield that question of time it was not possible to secure the great result, the declaration of public policy contained in this bill, I signed the report, and I stand by it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has not answered my second inquiry, perhaps he has not come to it; and that is, what manner of redemption it was that the English people, to whom he referred, came to when they did come? He answered the first question by stating that they did come to it in six or seven years. We have been ten years already. Will the Senator say what manner of redemption it was, whether it was this method or an absolute redemption?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not to be diverted into a recital of English history. The Senator knows very well that they redeemed in coin; and I would be very glad indeed if we could get Congress now to declare that the redemption in coin should be absolute. Can you do it? Will you therefore refuse any practical measure which produces the same result because you cannot persuade others to agree with you in every particular? In my judgment that ought not to be the guiding motive of Senators.

Now, sir, I believe that the object I have stated will be accomplished by this bill. As for the minor details of the bill they have been agreed to by both Houses of Congress. The modifications of the banking act are not very material. So far as they go they make the banking system free, and they contain that section of the House bill which makes redemption by banks in legal-tender notes immediate, positive, decisive. It requires the banks to place in the Treasury of the United States a fund amply sufficient in the opinion of the Treasurer of the United States to maintain this resumption. All the details of this bill as to national banks are in perfect harmony with the wishes of both Houses of Congress, with the reports of the committees of both Houses, and even with the views of the majority of those who are in favor of specie payments.

There was one point upon which there was some controversy, and that was the degree in which legal-tender notes should be retired as bank-notes were issued, and, as the Senator from Indiana properly says, upon that point a compromise was made. How else can you attain it? What reason can you give for one particular per cent. rather than another particular per cent.? When there was a difference only as to the degree, not as to the principle, after some hesitation we agreed to divide it, and made it 37½ per cent.

Now, Mr. President, there is but one fear that I have ever entertained, or that has ever been suggested to me by those who voted with me, in regard to the merits of this bill. It has been said to me over and over again, What security have you that this eighth section of the bill which provides for specie payments on the 1st of January, 1878, will not be repealed? Will not another Congress come in and sweep that out of the way? Having secured free banking, will not the people hereafter by their Senators and Representatives violate that stipulation of the law and remove and obliterate this public policy? I say in the name of the people of the United States, no, never; they never have done such a thing; they never will do such a thing; there is no danger of their doing it. Remember, Senators, here is a positive pledge to a particular class of public creditors to give a specific bond for an admitted debt past due and at a time fixed by law. When was such a pledge of the United States ever violated? When was such a pledge ever broken? I am glad to see this bill voted for by persons on all sides, of all political parties There is the pledge. It is not the indefinite promise to pay at the earliest day practicable like that of March, 1869. The condition of that pledge rested upon diverse views of public policy. But here the time is fixed; the terms are easy; our ability to issue the bond and to pay the interest stipulated for is conceded. It is not a party pledge, but is the pledge of the whole nation to pay a debt contracted for the salvation of the nation. To impute a purpose to violate this pledge as a mere means to secure free banking is to stamp all who participate in it with dishonor.

As to whether the national banking system shall be retained as the fixed policy of the United States, or whether it shall be swept away, or as to what form our currency may assume hereafter, those are questions for the future; but as for the pledge now made in this law that the holder of the United States note, if he presents it on and after January, 1878, shall receive that which is equivalent to coin, that is immutable as the laws of the Medes and Persians; it is written on the conscience and public faith of the nation; and I do not have any fear about it. If a future Congress would violate this section, that same Congress would have the power to pass any law they chose on the subject. If they would violate this public faith, would they not also issue an unlimited amount of greenbacks or do any other wild and disparaging thing dishonoring the public faith? If you can impute to a Congress hereafter that they would violate the public faith, would they not without such a pledge of the public faith pursue a policy more dangerous? What has checked the reissue of United States notes at this session except that pledge contained in the law of 1864 that the limit should not exceed $400,000,000? There it stood as a bar. Now when you get this stipulation in your laws, have you not secured the substance and are you afraid of a shadow?

As to free banking under this bill, that is a question every Senator will decide for himself. It seems to me it can do no harm to make the privilege now enjoyed mainly in the Eastern States open to all. Whether banks will retire under one provision, or whether banks will be organized under another, is a matter of opinion on which each can act for himself. Now, sir, I again appeal to the Senate. You may defeat this bill if you please; but if you do, you send this question home to the people and they will engage in all their primary assemblages in the discussion of these questions that have divided us for six months, questions that have been so difficult of solution here that able bodies of picked men are not able to harmonize their views with all the pressure of public opinion upon them in order to be able to agree upon a policy. If you defeat this bill, you send these questions, the most difficult of all in political economy, among the masses, to divide the people of the United States, perhaps to divide them into sectional parties over these complicated and contending questions. Congress was made to solve such questions. Congress ought to do it. Congress must do it in the end. And now, sir, when we have a bill which substantially secures the results at which we have aimed, is it wise to turn our backs upon it merely because it does not go so fast or so far as we would desire?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer it if the Senator from Connecticut will yield.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. DAVIS. I incline to favor this compromise; but there are one or two points in regard to which I should like to have information. The first question is, What difference, if any, it makes in the amount of tax now levied on national banks, which amounts to about 1 per cent.?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not the slightest; it will not affect it at all.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not understand whether the 5 per cent. that is ordered by this bill to be kept in the Treasury is to be taken from the 6 per cent. that is required by the country banks to be kept at home, or the 9 per cent. required by law to be kept in the redemption cities.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a part of the whole reserve. The Senator understands this business. The part deposited in New York will probably be transferred to the city of Washington. It is a part of their deposits just as the same sum deposited in New York would be. It is counted as a part of their reserve.

Mr. DAVIS. It must be one or the other, as the Senator must admit. It must come off of that at home or that in New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. Now the question is: Which will it come off of, or will it be taken from the 15 per cent. retained at home before?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should think it might come off here as part of the reserve. That is a question of division in arithmetic to which my attention has not been directed. My impression is that it would be a part of the reserve.

Mr. DAVIS. It would probably be left to the Secretary to decide.

Mr. SHERMAN. To the Comptroller, I suppose.

Mr. DAVIS. One further question. The Senator from Indiana named twenty-six and one-half millions that is now held as reserve for circulation as the probable amount that would be put in circulation under this bill. Does the Senator from Ohio make the same calculation?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a question upon which perhaps I would differ with the Senator from Indiana, because the amount of currency reserve held by the country banks is now 6 per cent. of their circulation, and the amount in the cities is two-fifths of 25 per cent.; that would be about 12½ per cent. The amount of currency reserve in the cities is 12½ per cent., and in the country banks 6 per cent. I should have to compute the proportion the city banks bear to the country banks before I could answer the question entirely. The Senator from Indiana says he has made that computation, which I have not. I take it, so far as that is concerned, every bank would undoubtedly maintain a reserve, even if the law no longer required it. They would maintain whatever reserve they deemed to be necessary and take the hazard and the risk of not having money enough on hand to pay every call.

Mr. DAVIS. That I understand; but my impression is that it will be a considerably larger amount than the Senator from Indiana named, and in that way I think it will be better than he has anticipated.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, I understand from the Senators who have spoken on this question that this report is a concession, a compromise; that is, that men who have opposite views with regard to the course which the Government ought to pursue with reference to the currency have conceded their extreme views and harmonized in this measure. I fully believe it to be a report which manifests concessions. It appears to me to be a concession of every financial principle which has been advocated on this floor which can be of any value. Here are men in favor of a resumption of specie payments and they have been in earnest, presenting their views with a great deal of force, and here comes in a report which says in regard to that measure that it may be delayed until 1878, and when that time arrives the Government shall or not, at its pleasure, redeem its currency in coin. Here is a concession—not that we will demand specie payment to-day, not that we will demand it in 1875 or 1876, but in 1878 if it shall be perfectly convenient for the Government to pay, not otherwise.

Here is also a concession on the part of those who are in favor of inflation or of free banking equally wonderful to me. What is conceded here? The bill provides for free banking. It opens the door perfectly free and wide enough for people to enter in and engage in the business of banking. Whosoever will may do so; but be it known to every Senator that there can be no organization of men to establish a bank unless there shall be in connection with it a reasonable prospect of remuneration. Now, upon what terms can men enter into this business with a reasonable prospect of profit? If I go into the market to-day and buy you bonds, I must give $1.12 or $1.15 for each dollar; but it has been proved here repeatedly that the profit to men engaged in banking, on the currency which they receive, is only from 1½ to 2 per cent. per annum. That having been asserted and proved so repeatedly upon this floor, I shall regard it as an established fact. But here you provide that men may go into market and buy their bonds and pay $1.12 or $1.15 for them, and at the end of three years and a half those bonds are to be at par. Now, suppose by obtaining currency and engaging in this business, you can make the highest amount of profit which has been proven, which would be 2 per cent. per annum, in the three and a half years you will have made 7 per cent., but you will have lost on your bonds another 7 per cent. This is the concession, the compromise which this report suggests has been made! I challenge any business man, I challenge any man who knows anything about dollars and cents, to engage in free banking under this bill with the prospect of making money, unless he shall be convinced that the Congress of the United States will not be true to its promises, that when the time shall come when we anticipate, as the Senator from Ohio does, a positive and complete redemption, that day will be postponed, as I believe it will be, if you agree to this compromise.

I am in favor of specie redemption. I think it is the duty of this Government to redeem its promises. Just as I think it is my duty, if I have made a promise to pay, when the time comes for me to pay according to my promise, to make any pecuniary sacrifice that my creditor shall demand in order to meet that promise, so I believe this Government is under obligations equally sacred and equally binding. But there has been delay after delay in keeping promise of the Government; and being under these peculiar circumstances I have believed and I still believe that we would come nearer fulfilling our promise than we have yet done if we would convert our legal-tender notes into an interest-bearing bond. This bill proposes to do that. When? Not to-day when the debt is due, but three years and a half hence; not to-day when you ought to meet your obligations, but at some future time when some contingency may arise which will make it exceedingly inconvenient for the Government.

I believe that the Government is as well able to exchange bonds bearing interest for the greenbacks to-day or on the 1st of July or the 1st of January next, as it will be on the 1st of July. or the 1st of January, 1878; and I can see no injustice in it. Although the Senator from Ohio made a suggestion which he thought would be embarrassing, yet I can see no injury to come from it.

There is another point in this report to which I will briefly refer. Our banking law now provides such a system of redemption that bank-notes and legal-tender notes are of equal value in all parts of the country. We have never had such a system before, and in that respect we have never had a system so valuable; and in saying this I do not mean to say that the redemption to-day is of any special value. I do not appreciate perhaps as I should the great advantage of exchanging a bank-note for a legal-tender note; but I do appreciate the present system of redemption which, if we adhere to it, will, when we come to a specie basis, place the mercantile and the commercial interests of this country in regard to exchanges on a higher plane than they have ever stood before.

But what does this report propose? It proposes that the banks shall redeem at their counters, and there shall be no other system of redemption except with the sub-treasury. Therefore this system of central redemption, where every bank-note can be redeemed with whatever you promise to redeem it with and can be of equal value, the moment you put this bill into operation and come to a specie basis, that moment you depreciate the value of a bank-note in proportion to its distance from its center or from the bank.

Let me illustrate this if I can. To-day a note issued by a bank in the city of Washington is just as good in the city of Saint Louis as a note issued by a bank there; but if you break up this present system of redemption and require that that note shall be redeemed only at its own counter or in the city of New York, you depreciate the value of that note in the city of Saint Louis; you impose a tax upon the mercantile community which they would not bear otherwise. Is that wise? In one sense it is. In one sense it is right and proper that a man should pay exchange just as much as he should pay freight; but, sir, no man and no set of men in the commercial community can pay these exchanges without an immense cost. But will it not be a burden to some parties? Yes, it will be a burden to the banks if they are required to do it. Then will it not be an act of injustice to require it of the banks, to charge it to them as a part of the consideration by which they shall pursue a banking business? Why? Because they can do this business cheaper than any other association of men or any other men; and it is but fair, they receiving the privileges they do from the Government, that they should in some way compensate the community for these privileges.

I might, if I had time, perhaps say a little more on this report. I regret that I can see no possible good to result to any class of men if it should be adopted by the Congress of the United States. I cannot see that it promotes expansion if any one wants expansion; I cannot see that it leads directly to specie payments; but it seems to me that it postpones the day about as much and about as far as from the present hour to the beginning of 1878.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, I am opposed to this bill, and propose to submit a few reasons for my conclusion. It is said by my distinguished friend from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] for whose opinions I have the very highest respect, whether I am with him or against him on any measure, that the country wants a settlement of this great question. Surely upon that branch of the subject between him and myself there is no issue. The people do want a settlement. They simply demand, however, that which is due to them and has been for many years by solemn law. They want a settlement; they want gold for the paper that they are holding. That is the settlement which they want.

But my friend says that in theory this matter will all work out harmoniously and delightfully by the 1st day of January, 1878. What evidences have we of that, except that which I have already announced my confidence in, his declaration, and I suppose the country at large will indorse to a very great extent his declaration in most instances; but this is one of the cases where the people are not so readily disposed to compromise. We are told by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, whom I have been following so closely and with a great deal of pleasure since this question was first introduced into the Senate, that the proposition now is to compromise. Compromise what? Is there any unsettled question between any parties? He who holds a five-dollar note, or a thousand-dollar note if you please, holds that which represents money that has been long due; and now, by way of compromise, these learned gentlemen propose to tell him that payment is to be deferred until 1878. What a beautiful compromise!

My friend says the theory of the bill is that by the 1st day of January, 1878, we shall have no jar, no difficulty. Then it is, I suppose, his idea that whoever lives to see that day will enjoy the millennium; all will be bright and easy; gold will flow in great abundance, and there will be no trouble with an American citizen on the subject of currency. We have no evidence justifying that in the past history of the country. When will that convenient season come? It is said by every Senator who has addressed the Senate on this subject that the Government has the ability to do that which it has solemnly pledged itself by law to do, at any time. If so, there is no necessity for deferring it; and the Senator is not here, if I understand the question, who is ready to say that the Government is not prepared just as well to put this proposed machinery into operation upon the 1st of January, 1875, as the 1st of January, 1878, by redeeming the indebtedness in bonds bearing 5 per cent. interest.

But then we are told, by way of giving it a beautiful sugar-coat, if you please, in section 8:

> That on and after the 1st day of January, 1878, any holder of United States notes to the amount of fifty dollars, or any multiple thereof, may present them for payment at the office of the Treasurer of the United States, or at the office of the assistant treasurer at the city of New York; and thereupon he shall be entitled to receive, at his option, from the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized and required to issue in exchange for said notes an equal amount of either class of the coupon or registered bonds of the United States provided for in the first section of the act approved on the 14th of July, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and the act amendatory thereof, approved the 20th day of January, 1871, which bonds shall continue to be exempt from taxation as provided in said act.

Why not make provision at an earlier day? There is no objection to it. The claims of parties holding the indebtedness of the United States will be no more sacred upon that day than they are now. The notes are due. Why not make preparation to redeem them? And if they are to be redeemed in bonds paying interest, why defer that time? It is ex parte. The parties holding the notes may not be willing to do that, and you have no just right to require them to postpone their claims.

> Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury in lieu of such bonds may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States.

There is the gold feature. It is very modestly approached, to say the least. To illustrate, where is the individual who would prefer to shell out gold instead of paper? What Secretary of the Treasury shall we expect to find in office who would do likewise? Upon such occasions small birds fly; they always do. You may go into executive session this evening, and it is all secret, and nothing is to be known, pro or con, as to what you have been doing, and yet before you leave the Senate door what you have done is being published in New York and sent broadcast throughout the country. Now if peradventure the Treasury should be prepared to pay out a little gold, who would get it? The laborer in the country? Do you suppose one of these dollars would ever get down to Texas? Never, under God Almighty's heaven, through that channel. New York would have every one of them. The men there would know the "dots," and they would have their demands on hand and they would realize on them.

What a beautiful idea to talk to me about a compromise and a resumption of coin payments! It is a burlesque upon common sense to me, with all due respect for distinguished friends who advocate it. It is a simple, plain proposition, and no man who has any idea of business can thus have the wool pulled over his eyes, for it amounts to that. It might inconvenience some person presenting his money to a very great degree. I recollect an anecdote told of old Stephen Girard in his day. There was a merchant in the city of Philadelphia who was disposed to make a run upon Girard's bank, and he had secured some $100,000 of Mr. Girard's paper. He very promptly made known to Mr. Girard the object of his visit when he presented himself. By the way, however, I should say that one of those little birds that I have been alluding to had flown toward Mr. Girard previously, and therefore he recognized the business of his visitor instantly and was as well informed of his intention as the man himself was. He asked Mr. Girard if he would be so kind as to cash a small amount of his paper. Mr. Girard promptly replied, "O, yes; certainly, sir." "Well," said the gentleman, "it is a very small amount." "It does not matter," says Mr. Girard, "about that; what is it?" "Only $100,000." He had come to the conclusion that Mr. Girard would tender excuses, such as not being prepared to meet $100,000, but he turned to his clerks at once and told them, "Count out that money to the gentleman." The clerks began to roll out the kegs of round dollars, and as soon as he saw them the visitor began to back out. Said he, "O, never mind, Mr. Girard; I am not particular about it this morning." "Well," said Girard, "I want to close up this transaction and it must be settled now. Here is the money that you have demanded." The party had no cart there; he had no way of disposing of it; he had no guard there to protect it; he was in a very serious difficulty, and then he begged the old banker for mercy. The money was there and he was very well aware of it.

Mr. MORTON. If he had greenbacks he could have carried them off in his pocket.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I will come to that. Girard's bank was certainly as good as greenbacks. My friend ought to have reflected on his greenback proposition that if he himself should present a large amount of greenbacks at the counter of the Treasury they might pour out the gold upon him whether he expected it or not. He may have had no idea of that when he signed his name to this report. But then they might do so, and thereby he would be seriously interfered with and unpleasantly situated, having more gold than he could control. One hundred thousand dollars at the day I speak of was more than equal to a million at this time.

But in looking over the happy names that are to be found to this article, I cannot but be amused, even if it were a pure accident, at how appropriate they are. I find the name of my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] here. He having gotten this concession and compromise is as merry as a sixteen year old belle having just received a beautiful bouquet from her distinguished lover. He is perfectly happy. I am rejoiced to see him thus pleased on all occasions. But there are other gentlemen who figure very conspicuously. For instance, here is the name of "C. B. FARWELL." Mr. FARWELL is a distinguished gentleman. I have nothing to say against him. I appreciate his action and his purity of integrity because when he signed his name to this report he handed out his hand and said, "Farewell, Gold; that is the last I will ever hear of you. Farewell, Gold." [Laughter.] That is very appropriate indeed. But, sir, I do not see another distinguished name, a member of the committee from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.] Mr. CLYMER declines to give us the benefit of his name here. Mr. CLYMER was not so good a squirrel for climbing as to commence climbing this morning after gold, because we can see already in the reports from New York that gold is beginning to go up and he would have to go, I know not how many rounds of the ladder, whether thirty-three, fifty, or one hundred, to reach and get in proximity to the gold question. Therefore Mr. CLYMER very sensibly concluded to remain precisely where he was. I compliment him for doing so, and I for one determined on this occasion to stand by him. I should like to make his acquaintance. He is a man of good sense. No unnecessary climbing for him. [Laughter.] His name is not here.

Resumption! Some of our friends have said: "Certainly you will go with us for this. You are for resumption, are you not?" Surely I am for resumption; but I am sincere in that resumption. Talk not to me about resumption under this! It may be done in 1878 say you! Why, we shall be further off from it then if it is not done now than we are at this time. There is no doubt about that. Who is it that is going to cease to operate his spindles in the cotton and woolen factories, in his leather operations, in the various machineries that are so successfully employed now in the American Union? According to the history of the world is it to be expected that all the parties who are thus interested and participating in the great enterprises of the day will be successful? If so, then indeed that happy millennium that the distinguished Senator, my friend from Indiana, has portrayed in this matter may be realized in 1878. But we do know that such will not be the fact. That is demonstrated, and we shall be further from resumption then than we are now beyond a doubt.

My distinguished friend from Connecticut, who sits close to me, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM,] is for free banking. I have no particular objection to that. But he is so much delighted with the idea of free banking that he does not see anything else in this thing. He is very well satisfied. I think that heals all his wounds to a considerable extent. I congratulate him; I am gratified that it suits some of our friends; but be it remembered that all the people of the United States do not propose to embark in banking. If they did, there would be a perfect failure. There are thousands and thousands of laboring, toiling men who are earning their subsistence by the sweat of their brow. I have seen nothing here that tends toward the protection of one of these individuals; not an iota. They are simply told that they may per possibility get the sight of a gold dollar about the 1st of January 1878. The large money-dealers who have bonds and are able to get hold of them at that day are to be protected. They are looking to their interests very carefully. They will thereafter receive 5 per cent. on their greenbacks turned into bonds; but what is the poor man to receive? Is he to be protected to the thousandth part of a fraction directly or remotely? Not a word of it. You prey upon him unmistakably just as a large fish does upon a small one in the mighty waters of creation. The large eat the small fish, and there is no end of them. So under this the rich men grow fat and large, and the poor man toils for a subsistence that you try to wring from him. That is not the kind of legislation that I am in favor of.

If this Government owes this money, as we know it does, there can be no successful answer to the proposition that it should honestly and faithfully come up to the work and vindicate the character of the nation and its ability by making good your solemn pledge; and until you have done that, you never will satisfy the American people. I care not whether a man be a democrat or whether he be republican, or what he be politically; he demands the amount you owe him at your hands.

Tell me not that it will prostrate the republican party if this compromise is not effected and accepted. I say if the republican party is to be perpetuated upon a platform of bankruptcy, it is time that it was disrupted and let others take hold of it who are capable and honestly disposed to do that which is beneficial to this mighty nation. If there be any republicans, I am one of them; but I am no republican at the expense of the honor of this great nation. I am opposed in every sense of the word to this compromise. Indeed there is no compromise in it. I am reminded of a little occurrence that illustrates this matter to me very well, to say the least of it. About fifty years ago there was a very distinguished lawyer living in Kentucky by the name of Haggin. I have no doubt the Kentucky Senators who sit right behind me knew him and can recollect the anecdote. Haggin lived in Lexington, Kentucky, one of the leading members of that bar, and that bar at that day was scarcely rivaled. The great Clay, Bledsoe, John Rowan, and a host of other distinguished men that the reader of American history is familiar with belonged to that bar. Haggin was a member, and a prominent member, of that bar. He was informed that there was a widow lady living in the neighborhood who had about $2,000 to loan. The money would be convenient to him and he applied to her for it. He was above suspicion, and she very readily brought out the $2,000 and handed it over to Mr. Haggin. Haggin drew his note for it at twelve months after date, but at the bottom of the note he added a few little words: "Provided"—just about like this beautiful little play is here that the Secretary of the Treasury may do so and so—"Provided the said Haggin is not to be hastened." [Laughter.] When the note fell due, that happy period when my friend [Mr. MORTON] says everything will be perfectly lovely, with no difficulty in the world, so that we shall be all right, it was not exactly so with Haggin. Mr. Haggin was not ready to respond. The lady called upon an attorney and instituted suit. Upon the trial Mr. Haggin pleaded "there is a qualification which was part and parcel of the note I made that I am not to be hastened." The judge, however, did not see it in that light. The judge ruled that the gentleman was to be hastened. Frequently thereafter when the lawyers through the State were riding in company—and I take it for granted my friend behind me [Mr. MCCREERY] was with them occasionally—a horse would lag behind and the rider would spur it on, and the others would say to him, "You know he said he was not to be hastened," [laughter,] and then how the rider popped the spur into him and brought him up! Now pop the spur into the Union and make the Union come up to an honest declaration of the Congress of the United States to pay this money that is due, as the said Haggin had to do.

I think I will try a further illustration, and then I believe I shall yield the floor. I want to tell an Irish anecdote, and if I cannot draw from the Irish upon whom can I draw, because I claim to have come from that source myself and therefore I may speak of an Irishman. An Irishman had conceived the idea that he could act upon the theory that really he could train his horse to live without any subsistence, giving him proper care and attention otherwise. He was going to solve a great problem as he considered. Very well; he put his horse up in pretty good condition, and his neighbors came in very regularly and interrogated him, "How are you getting along?" Well, now, I can see some of my neighbors coming to some one near me. Here is one that I love as well as any of you here, my friend on the right, [Mr. FERRY, of Michigan.] I can point out distinguished friends sitting around in different portions of the Senate who come regularly to the seat of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] who is the keeper of the horse now in training, and they ask, "How are you getting along with your experiment?" "O, first rate, doing most elegantly; I will succeed; no doubt about that; theory tells me so; give him plenty of good kind words and I suppose some little rubbing, but no food; no gold, certainly not, but plenty of greenbacks." [Laughter.] My friend loves to play with the word greenbacks. Gentlemen continue to visit him and they get favorable responses regularly; but finally, just about, as it were, the first day of 1878, they all come up with a great deal of anxiety, "How does he get along?" "O," says he "he was getting along very finely, but he died last night." [Laughter.] Here is my friend's theory, and there is his practice. He will tell all his friends who approach him now that it is working elegantly; no doubt about success; but when January 1, 1878, arrives, the horse dies and there is an end of it. That thing will not do. [Laughter.] This is the history of this case. This proposition cannot live; there is nothing in it. There is no substance based upon theory. Nothing under the sun known to man that has ever been realized is able to support the doctrine that in 1878 you will be willing to do that which you should do in 1875 if this theory ought to prevail. Therefore I am opposed to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays on that question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am quite satisfied that the committee of conference in relation to this bill have endeavored to do the very best thing practically possible, and I am ready to accord to them some spirit of self-sacrifice; but not believing that the bill they report is a bill which is to satisfy anybody in its practical operations, I shall not be able to vote for it.

In the first place, the theory adopted here is to retire 37½ per cent. of greenbacks for every dollar that is issued of national-bank notes; that is to say, there is to be $37.50 of the greenback currency retired for every $100 on new national-bank currency that shall be issued. That is, on the face of it, an expansion of the currency to a very large amount. Let us see what it amounts to. It is proposed in the first place that we shall reduce the amount of legal-tenders outstanding from the present $382,000,000 to $300,000,000, and then stop. That is, we are to retire $82,000,000 of the greenbacks, and how much are we allowed to issue of the national-bank currency? That would amount to $219,333,000. On the theory of this bill that amount would be issued, less the 5 per cent. that is to be retained in the Treasury of the United States for redemption, which would leave practically as the issue of the national banks $208,367,000, and there would be retired $82,000,000 of greenbacks. Then after that the scheme of free banking is unlimited. You may then proceed up to the amount of a thousand millions if it is possible to induce anybody to enter into the business, as I do not think it would be.

But there are other features of this bill. It is proposed that in 1878, January 1, the greenbacks shall be converted at par into bonds at the option of the holder. What will be the effect of that? Clearly it would have the effect to appreciate the value of the greenback to a certain extent, but it would also have the effect of depreciating the value of the bonds of the country. If these greenbacks, when so redeemed by bonds, were to be canceled and retired, I should have no objection to the proposition; but here is a provision made by which they may be perpetually reissued, and it is made imperative that they shall be reissued. Consequently this amount of greenbacks that may be so repeatedly reissued will have a very damaging effect in depreciating the value of our national bonds.

But, Mr. President, the friends of this bill I think deceive themselves if they suppose they are going to get much of free banking or expansion of the currency under it, except what occurs from the release of reserves. The proposition is that in January, 1878, greenbacks may be exchanged for bonds at par. What capitalist, what banker, would go into the market now and buy bonds at 15 or 18 per cent. premium for the purpose of going into the business of banking, when by waiting three and a half years he could have his bonds at par, and then there was almost an absolute certainty if he invested his money in banking at the present time that there would be a positive loss of 15 or 18 per cent. or whatever the premium on bonds now is, as the consequence of entering upon it?

I do not desire to discuss this question at any length; but there was one thing said by the Senator from Indiana in his opening remarks in relation to this matter, that this was to be a final settlement of the currency question. I should like to know of the Senator, when he comes back here at the next session and finds that free banking is not the practical result of this bill or that it does not work much in that direction, whether the question will not be again opened? I do not think it will be settled at all by this bill. Besides, if we are to resume specie payments in 1878, it seems to me that there is a plan and there are many plans by which the end might be reached much earlier and with less distress to the country, as certainly the Government might furnish the gold by issuing its bonds in exchange for gold almost at any time and pay it out for greenbacks. Under the conviction, therefore, that this bill is in theory one of almost indefinite expansion and that the result will disappoint even the friends of the bill, that free-banking to any extent will not be the consequence which will follow and that it is not likely to secure specie resumption, I shall be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I cannot vote for this report. There is no doubt of the sincere and honest effort of the committee to come to a satisfactory arrangement; but I think that those who believed that an expansion of our paper currency is necessary to promote the business interests of the country, when they secured that by the report by providing for free banking or at least supposed they secured it, should have given to those who differ with them and want resumption a measure which would lead to specie payments, and this especially as the desire to come to specie payments is common to those who are in favor of and to those who are opposed to a greater expansion. There is no doubt of a common desire, however we may differ as to measures, in the Senate and in the House with all parties to reach the great desideratum, specie payments. But so far from the measure proposed bringing us to specie payments, it positively enacts that we shall not in any event reach that result before 1878. Far better run the chance of coming to specie payments without than with this bill. Up to 1878 this bill provides, and it is a provision in which all who engage in free banking have an interest, so that it would be unjust to repeal the law, that there shall not be specie payments No one under the bill would purchase United States bonds at 1.15 if they were not assured that they were not to be reduced to par in greenbacks earlier than 1878. And when we reach that year the bill provides we shall not then resume specie payments, but that then the return which the bill-holder is to get is to be not money but bonds.

Suppose that under the law the $382,000,000 Government currency is funded in bonds, what is the result? This nation, after delaying specie payment until 1878 and after investing the vast amount of United States notes in bonds and being liable perpetually for the interest on such bonds, is then by this law obliged, not in time of war, not from any exigency, not when there is any excuse for it, but is then obliged by the force of this bill and from no other necessity to reissue those promises again, and thus to place the Government in exactly the same situation that it is now as to specie payments, excepting that we will have gone to an expenditure and liability which, applied to the accumulation and obtaining of gold, would bring us to specie payments in a year.

That, Mr. President, is not all. If we had adopted the policy of accumulating gold we should be brought to specie payments without any contraction, because that process would bring all the hoarded coin of the country into circulation and produce a healthful expansion——

It is said we cannot get the gold. There never was a more patent error. Why, we are told here to-day that the annual surplus gold coming to the Government is $100,000,000. That, I suppose, is a mistake; our annual surplus gold is about $44,000,000. The whole amount is $180,000,000, and the expenditures for interest and diplomatic salaries by the Government is about $136,000,000 in gold.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. We have eighty-one millions on hand and part of that belongs to depositors.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. We have but $50,000,000 on hand that belongs to us. Then for the purposes of this accumulation, so as to commence specie payment, we have the products of the mines which yield us sixty or seventy millions, of which perhaps one-half goes abroad. There is in the country $150,000,000 which is hoarded. England, too, stands ready at a low rate of interest to help us in the accumulation of gold, because it is the interest of England from two considerations to aid us: first, because her people hold our securities, and, second, because England knows that while our currency is below par it operates as a prohibition against her manufacturers coming here. There is no trouble in accumulating gold sufficient for resumption. And what in that event would be the result? If the United States notes amount to $400,000,000, how much gold would we require? In 1838–'39, in 1858–'59, after the banks of the country had suspended they resumed without one of them having to resume with more than 33 per cent. of their issue. But the nation could resume much more securely with even less than 33 per cent. The Government would be more favorably situated as regards resumption than the banks, for two reasons: first, great wealth of the nation is a constant security that payment will be made, and, second, the United States notes being necessary to the banks as a reserve would not be sent to the Treasury for redemption.

Mr. President, if we should adopt the policy of making the United States notes convertible rather than redeemable, and there is a broad difference in those two words, we would have established in the country a measure which would give us all the benefits of a national bank without any of the disadvantages. Our country would possess all the benefits which England and France derive from their national banks, and from the extent of our territory we need those advantages more than any other country. Six months after we resumed probably $50,000,000 on deposit in the Treasury would make and preserve $300,000,000 of United States notes constantly convertible into gold, and the nation would have the advantage and profit of floating $250,000,000 without the payment of interest, while at the same time we would have kept our faith to the bill-holders by making our notes always convertible into gold. We would have a currency that would resist panics, that would remain in the country, that would be uniform throughout the length and breadth of the land, that would be a great convenience to the banking business of the nation; but instead of that we are told here that we must postpone specie payments until 1878, then have bonds, then reissue the greenbacks again, and so on ad infinitum. Mr. President, I do not doubt that we are in a vastly better situation without adopting any financial measure than we would be should we adopt this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York calls for the yeas and nays on the question of concurring in this report.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not intend to say more than a few words on the report now pending before this body. It seems to me that it bristles all over with objectionable features; and I do not share with the Senator from Ohio his confidence that the legislation may not be changed before the 1st of January, 1878, so as to entirely annul the redemption features of the pending bill. I do know one thing, that the inflation is immediate, that the redemption is very remote. Sir, I do not believe that it is to the advantage of any class in this country that the price of the greenbacks shall be elevated by any such method as is proposed in this bill. Gentlemen talk about the resumption of specie payments. It is utterly impossible to resume specie payments and keep that resumption permanent with the great volume of paper currency now afloat. Specie will not remain with us as long as the price of everything that is produced, as long as the price of everything that we manufacture and of everything we raise here is so much higher than the prices of the same commodities and the same materials in every other portion of the world. You may make your greenbacks redeemable in bonds, and then again issue the greenbacks, but it will be all in vain. When an inflated currency is in a country, when prices have risen in proportion to that expansion, contraction is the only remedy for it, and specie payment can never be maintained without a contraction of that currency.

Sir, all the evils that have been complained of heretofore with regard to this irredeemable currency that we have will be just as active when you shall make the greenbacks convertible into bonds as they are to-day. It makes very little difference whether gold rates at $1.12 or $1.03 so long as your paper is not immediately convertible into gold; all the grievances we complain of, all the hardships upon the workers of this country upon the constant fluctuation that is robbing them day by day of the fruits of their labor, will be just as active as ever.

This bill will have the effect to raise by a small percentage the value of the greenback. It will have the effect also to degrade the bonds of the United States to a small extent. In any event it can never bring back specie payments, because the greenback will bear no just relation to prices here except to the price of bonds. The bonds again will have to be negotiated abroad perhaps for gold. There will be no gold among the people of the country, the greenback will not be convertible into gold, and all the fluctuations that we have complained of heretofore, aggravated perhaps by the increased volume of paper money, will be felt after this redemption shall have taken place.

In the next place, what will be the proposition to get back to specie payments after the 1st of January, 1878? How can it be done? Admitting that gold will not remain in the country when the price of everything is at so high a point as to drive it out, then the problem will be presented to this body and to the country, how can we get an unvarying standard of value; how can we return to and maintain specie payments? Everybody will see then that it must be by contraction. That contraction, with prices raised as this additional volume of currency which this bill contemplates will cause them to rise, will make the revulsion ten times greater than it would be to return to specie payments to-day. Between this and the 1st of January, 1878, the country will have suffered a great deal more than it would suffer by returning to specie payments within a year or within six months. You inflate money that can neither be hoarded nor exported, and you leave the largely increased volume of currency to float the property of the country and to effect its exchanges. Of course, property must rise, and we shall be further off on the 1st day of January, 1878, than ever. It seems to me that the bill travels in a circle.

Taking this bill section by section, there are objections all through it. Take section 8. Omitting to read the first part of the section, it provides "that the Secretary of the Treasury in lieu of such bonds may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue the United States notes so received either in exchange for coin at par, or, with the consent of the holder, in the redemption of bonds then redeemable at par, or in the purchase of bonds at not less than par, or to meet the current payments for the public service; and when used to meet current payments an equal amount of the gold in the Treasury shall be applied in redemption of the bonds known as five-twenty bonds."

It seems to me it takes all the gold we have in the Treasury to pay our current expenses. I see no provision here made for the hoarding of gold needed to purchase bonds in lieu of the greenbacks which shall be reissued after bonds shall have been exchanged for them. And what will be done? Suppose that the exigencies of the country require that the greenbacks received for bonds shall be reissued, and in accordance with the provisions of this bill they are used for the current expenditures and there is no gold in the Treasury; there is no proposition here to accumulate gold, and there may be none in the Treasury at that time to meet this provision of the bill.

So I say, Mr. President, without entering into a detailed statement of the many objectionable features of this bill, that I believe, first, that after this bond redemption shall have taken place the country will be as far from specie payments as it was before. I believe that not only will it be as far from specie payments, but that it will be much more difficult to resume specie payments after such redemption than it would be to-day. I believe that the debtor class will be as clamorous then as they are now in the presence of redemption. The only way, it seems to me, to restore this country to prosperity is to restore the standard that the world uses to measure values. The only way we can export products from this country and enjoy foreign trade is to make the prices of commodities in this country bear some reasonable relation to the prices throughout the world. Instead of raising the value of greenbacks by arbitrary measures like this, the easiest and the most sensible measure is to reduce the volume of the greenbacks so that their value shall approximate to the price of gold and at the same time reduce the inflated prices now ruling, so that we shall be able to deal with the rest of the world without dealing at disadvantage, as we are now doing. Do what we will, the country is still operating upon a gold basis. The greenback manifestly rests upon the gold to-day. The average hope and confidence of the people that it will be ultimately redeemed measures the value of the greenback to-day; but instead of returning to specie payments, which I believe it is easy to do within two years without any great danger to any interest, we are using this sharp cimeter—gold—to cut our bargains. But we have wound paper all around its edges, so that we hack and cut, and every time a bargain is divided some other people get the greater half in the division.

We should be on the road to prosperity, if instead of this bill it were possible that the present volume of greenbacks and bank-bills could be left afloat until the year 1878 or 1877 or any other time that this body could agree upon, and if the legal-tender clause could be repealed and people should commence to think correctly on this subject, and should remember day by day when they see the quotations in the commercial and financial markets that gold is $1.12 one day and $1.08 another, that it means simply that greenbacks have been fluctuating, and that it is a solecism, that it is doing violence to the language to say that the par of the world is above par, or that the par of the world, which is gold, is below par. We should accustom ourselves to saying what is the truth, that paper is above or below par, as the case may be. Then it would be well if people would make their bargains payable in gold or on the basis of gold, and then pay in the paper of the country just what that paper will bring in the market, for it is worth no more nor less by the legal-tender clause being added to it. I do not think that the legal-tender clause added to it makes it worth 1 per cent. more than it would be worth without it, even though you make no proposition for the redemption of the greenbacks. But let all contracts and debts now outstanding, before such plan be agreed on, be paid in greenbacks. I would get the people accustomed to make their bargains in gold, and by having it so that it could pay debts contracted you would find that gold would flow into the country and that prices would come down to where they really belong.

I had not intended to say a word about this bill, but I simply rose to protest against its passage, believing that it is full of surprises, believing that the friends of the bill do not and cannot fully know what its effects will be, though at the same time believing that they have acted entirely in good faith, and that they have probably done the best they could to harmonize conflicting opinions. But, sir, I believe that evil and only evil will spring out of its passage. I am opposed to any proposition, come in whatever form it may, that attempts to override what God himself has made for money, that attempts to make money a commodity and to make commodities money. I believe there is a vast and wide difference between the functions of the two, and that any departure from this plain truth will punish the country that so departs. I believe the sooner we come down to a purely gold standard the better it will be for the country. I believe that when we do so come down we shall have entered upon an era of prosperity which will be unbroken for a century. I believe that we shall enter upon an era of prosperity that in a very few years will make this God-favored land the clearing-house for all the world. Standing as we do half-way between Asia and Europe, the exchanges of the world will be effected in our markets. But as long as we use the present irredeemable, inflated, redundant currency we drive the world's instrument of commerce—gold—from our midst, and it will be found impossible for us to compete successfully with any other nation for the world's commerce.

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. President, the arguments of Senators from the gold-producing States seem, when condensed, to be very much like that of the tanner in a town council, who insisted that for the purposes of fortification there was nothing like leather. With them gold, gold, seems to be the only thing on earth that is of any value. The Senator who has just taken his seat called it God-made money. Sir, I think that a new doctrine. I can find nowhere within my reading that God has pronounced that the only legal-tender of a country shall be gold. [Laughter.]

The Senator speaks of the repeal of the legal-tender act as being the thing which will bring to this country prosperity. I think most of the Senators here agree with me and the people of the country agree with me in insisting that the legal-tender of this country shall not be confined to any particular metal or substance at all. Gold is not, as he says, the legal-tender the world over. In one country gold is legal-tender, in another it is silver, in another it is lead, and in some wampum, as my friend the Senator from California [Mr. HAGER] suggests. It is whatever has been decreed by the sovereign power of the country to be legal-tender.

As to the fact that the greenbacks or the bonds of this country represent the average hopes and fears of the people, there is some truth in that. I was astonished at the speech made by the Senator at a former time, in which he spoke of the fact that some Senator—I do not remember what one—had alluded to our legal-tender currency in terms of enthusiasm as having been "battle-born;" and he said that at that time the rebellion might have been better suppressed by borrowing gold. Sir, it was an ill-advised time to talk about borrowing gold when the thunder of the enemy's cannon shook the windows of the Senate Chamber. When you might hear at any time with the windows and doors of the lobbies open the sound of the bugle from our own troops rallying to meet the assaults of the enemy, it was a poor time to talk about going into the world's market to buy gold. We should have been spurned; and, sir, I think that the law authorizing the issue of the greenbacks was a large factor in the problem of saving the country and restoring the national power, and I do not think that the people of this country will look with any favor upon the project of repealing the legal-tender act. I do not think that either myself or the Senator from Nevada, or probably any of us who are now sitting in this Chamber, will be here when that act is repealed. I think, too, that this discussion having continued the whole session, there having been many conflicting interests to be reconciled, the conference committee have agreed upon what will give the most satisfaction to the country and satisfaction to a very large majority of this Congress. I believe that the report of the conference committee will be agreed to, and that it will be a very practicable and satisfactory solution of the financial question.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, when this report was made, and this morning when the question was about to be put to the Senate on its adoption, I supposed it would elicit but very little discussion. I am sure that I did not purpose saying one word in reference to it. After the report was printed and I examined it, it was with some hesitancy that I came to the conclusion that I should support it, but having some features in it that I have persistently advocated as well as some that I have opposed and it being as I believe and as was said by the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, a fair compromise between the two conflicting ideas here in reference to a contraction or expansion of the currency, I came to the conclusion that I should support it as a compromise fixing definitely the position of the banking system in this country, and at the same time arranging the conflicting opinions of friends in this Chamber and concentrating them upon this settlement of the question. But I must confess that I have been somewhat surprised in finding arrayed against this measure of compromise many persons who persistently on this floor for day after day and week after week, ay for month after month, have advocated the very proposition itself that is contained in this compromise measure and a proposition that I have as persistently opposed.

When we are told that this measure runs in a circle, and that it is not a measure that is agreeable to those who advocate specie payment, I witness the fact that to many it is not agreeable, and while I witness that fact I stand amazed and surprised at the arguments made here against the measure by the very men who persistently voted for this portion of it before. When the Senator from Ohio reported the first bill to the Senate it contained the very provision that is contained in this conference report, with verbal changes only. What was it? That the greenbacks should be retired on a 5 per cent. bond. What other difference? Merely a change of six months in time, no change in principle whatever. The very principle adopted by the chairman of the Finance Committee, and voted for by every Senator who has advocated specie payments on this floor, is the same principle contained in this report to-day; but to-day we find it denounced, and why? Because it will prove destructive to the great interests of this country. How is it that they have so readily and so recently ascertained the fact that it will prove destructive to the interests of the country, when many so recently advocated it as the only palliation for the great difficulties in the finances of the country at this time and as the proper step in the direction of specie payments which all desire so much?

Now, sir, I wish to say to Senators on this floor who have been in the habit of denouncing Senators who have advocated different measures that have been before Congress as "inflationists" and as Senators who desired to demonetize silver and gold and as opposed to specie payments, I want to say to them now once for all that I know no man in the Senate Chamber who has ever opposed specie payments. The only thing we have said or argued was that we could not hurriedly undertake to adopt a return to specie payments, because the specie did not exist in the country for the redemption of our promises to pay, and the tenor of the arguments has been, however unfortunate the expression of the idea may have been, that the country should come to specie payment gradually, and that when the time should come nobody would oppose it. But, as I said, an argument was made to show that we could come to specie payment not only gradually but in a much shorter time than many of us believed the capacity and ability of the country would justify. This proposition was argued, was reasoned, and opposed in this Senate Chamber on account of the times and on account of the mode and the manner of arriving at the result.

I do not wish to discuss the character of money. I do not wish to examine as to the character of money that "God designed," as the Senator from Nevada says, should be a circulating medium, or that France or England or Germany or Russia or China or any other country desires. That question has been argued before, and it is an unfit question to be argued here to-day. The only question before the Senate to-day and that ought to be before the country is, is this a fair measure; is it such a measure of reconciliation between conflicting ideas in reference to this question as we can stand upon and as we can maintain before the country, or as will be satisfactory and beneficial to the country—not as a political question but as a financial question and a question of benefit to the interests of the communities of the different States?

My friend from Vermont with his usual ingenuity makes a two-edged speech. He first says there is, I forget how many millions of inflation as he calls it in this bill or increase of the currency. If he will pardon me, I will ask him to give me the figures he relied upon as to the amount.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Two hundred and eight millions, deducting the eighty-two millions of greenbacks.

Mr. LOGAN. How much would that leave? I have not time to calculate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. One hundred and twenty-six millions.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I appeal to the Senate and I ask their attention for a moment while I examine the argument of my friend from Vermont. He first appeals to what is called the contraction element in the Senate—I do not wish to use such a term as that except as a mere term of designation—and he says that it will be expansion to the amount of one hundred and twenty-six millions. Why? Because he says banks will be established and that much more currency will be afloat in the country. But mark the change, and how sudden it was, in the ten-minute speech of my friend from Vermont; he sat down with the conclusion expressed to the Senate that there would be no banking under it at all. That is strange reasoning. He reasons to one side that it will increase the currency, and then turning to the other side he tries to deter them from voting for it because he says it will not increase the currency. That was the argument!

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Illinois does not wish to misstate me?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. My idea was that the theory of the bill was expansion. I did say that I thought practically there would be no new banks under it to any great extent, and certainly not as many as I think would withdraw under the privilege granted here to all banks to reduce their circulation to $50,000.

Mr. LOGAN. The statement was made in such a manner as to be perfectly understood by every Senator in this Chamber that the first point in the Senator's argument was that it was inflation, and the second point, and his appeal to the other side, was that we could have no banking under it. That was the conclusion of the Senator's argument, and he cannot get away from it. Of course an argument like that may be very eloquent and very entertaining, but at the same time, to intelligent men, it is very amusing. It is about as amusing, and about as logical, and about as correct as the statement I have heard of being made once on the witness-stand. One neighbor had sued another for breaking a kettle that he had borrowed from him. He called him up and charged the jury that he was liable for so much; he had borrowed the kettle and broken it, and he was liable for damages. He (the defendant) was called on the stand, and said to the jury: "Gentlemen of the jury, I will state to you that when I borrowed the kettle it was broken; in the second place, I will state to you that it was sound when I returned it; and in the third place that I never borrowed the scoundrel's kettle at all." [Laughter.] That is the kind of argument which was made to a jury, and that is the kind of argument my friend uses here in the Senate Chamber in reference to this bill: First, it is expansion; and, secondly, it is contraction—singular in its operation, I am sure.

And then our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is opposed to this measure. He finds fault with it, too, because it will ruin the country; it is impossible to get to specie payments in this way! I do not blame him for making this argument. Nobody will blame him for it, because it is the only one probably that came to his mind at the time; for it is a well-known fact that our friend, the ex-Secretary of the Treasury and the highly respected Senator, to-day is opposed to anything being done in respect to this question and only wishes things let alone. He is in favor of standing still, neither moving forward or backward, to the right or the left, but standing still as a stock or stone and moving not at all. That has been his argument in the Senate for months. Of course he would make that argument, for he thinks it is the one that probably would be the strongest to find its way into the minds of certain gentlemen here who suspect generally the effect of this provision of the bill; at least that is my theory about it. The Senator said, not in speech but in questioning the Senator from Ohio on the floor, that instead of good results it would produce bad results.

Then, last but not least, comes our favored Senator from the gold mining region, [Mr. JONES,] always pleasant and humorous, kind and good-natured; feeling as though there was nothing that the earth should give forth except the yellow-tinted coin that it might jingle in the pockets of the many. He finds nothing that Moses admires, but is willing that some Aaron should be leader in this great land of ours and make it bow down to the golden calf and become its worshiper. Sir, the people of this country do not worship gold; they worship their God, but they do use gold as a medium of exchange.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Illinois is a very frank-spoken Senator. He has criticised somewhat my conception of this bill. I now desire to ask him what he thinks will be the effect of it as to expansion or contraction?

Mr. LOGAN. I will try to tell the Senator as near as I can what I think the effect will be. That was what I rose for. I will do it before I sit down; and if I should get so tired that I desire to sit down without noticing it, I hope he will call my attention to it again, because I shall certainly give my opinion about it. I desire now to answer one remark of my friend from Nevada, to whom I very gladly listened. He says the only road to specie payments is contraction

Mr. President, I will say there is no doubt of one thing. You certainly can contract to specie payments; there is no question about that. If there were $100,000,000 of gold in this country, and you contract the currency of the country down to $100,000,000, then of course you have specie payments, because you have enough specie to redeem the $100,000,000. If that is what the Senator means, I certainly agree with him that such contraction would bring specie payment and ruin also. I should like to know what the Senator does mean when he says the only remedy is contraction? If contraction is the only remedy, you have to contract down until the faith of the country and the gold unite, and until it bloats your money in the country without any person asking, "Does the redeemer of this money live?" It is only in that way. There must be gold enough in the country or silver or whatever the redemption may be in, with the faith of the people based on the ability of the Government to redeem the amount of the money it has, before you have gold redemption in that way.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator allow me to explain?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I mean by contraction that whenever you shall have reduced the volume of what you call money to that amount which would circulate in the country if the currency were purely metallic, prices throughout the country will also shrink at the same time, and gold from all parts of the earth will flow in to buy your commodities, and we shall have plenty of money throughout the country when that sort of contraction takes place, and specie payments cannot be maintained without it.

Mr. LOGAN. That is a very nice theory; but I am going on the theory that we have got to have the money to redeem ourselves, because we are the ones who are bound to redeem the United States notes; we must rely on ourselves. If we contract the currency and contract the prices of your commodities at the same time down to such a low point that there is a great profit in purchasing them, of course the people will bring gold and silver to buy them. If you shrink the price of corn down to ten cents per bushel, everybody would run to buy corn to speculate on; but I do not think the farmer would make much profit by that. If you contracted wheat down to twenty-five cents a bushel the same result would follow. But who profits by it? The man with the gold profits by it, and the farmer is the man who becomes wrecked in his property and in his interests.

My friend from Nevada would profit hugely under a contraction of that kind, because he has gold uncounted and untold, and if the price of commodities were reduced until a penny would purchase the amount that five pennies buy now, instead of being worth ten he would be worth his fifty millions. That is the difference, the opulent would increase their riches, the impoverishment of thousands of unfortunate persons would be produced, although having the same light of heaven shining on them and the same desire for prosperity that my friend from Nevada has.

But my friend says that this will increase the price of greenbacks and will reduce the price of bonds. I should like to ask him a question right here. If to-day greenbacks were appreciated up to the value of gold, would not the price of bonds depreciate? Would they not go down?

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. LOGAN. They would not? Why? A bond to-day is worth 115 in greenbacks. If the greenback goes up to gold, that excess is stricken off, and your bond is worth only the same in gold that it is in greenbacks. Hence the argument is self-destructive. The very moment you put greenbacks up to gold, of course your bonds are brought to that standard.

But then my friend says section 8 is very objectionable. Why? Because section 8 provides that the greenbacks shall be redeemable in 1878 in a 4 per cent., 4½ per cent., or 5 per cent. bond, or in gold. Well, if they are redeemable at that time in gold, and we can come to redemption at that time in gold, and we believe we can—my friend says we can come to redemption in two years—then if we are able to come to it in two years, and we propose to do it in three and a half years, how is anybody injured by that? If we can come to it in two years, can we not come to it in three and a half years?

Mr. JONES. Never, under this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know why. The bill says the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay with gold or bonds, redeem the greenbacks. I presume the Senator means that the only way to come to specie payment is to repeal the legal-tender act and burn up the greenbacks. Is that the idea?

Mr. JONES nodded assent.

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly. So my friend from Nevada thinks that the only way is to repeal the legal-tender act and burn up the greenbacks. There is the proposition, and right there I enter issue with my friend from Nevada. If you repeal the legal-tender law, by that act you repeal the contract which is written right on the back of the bill that it shall be received for all dues in this country save duties on imports and interest on the public debt. It is payable and receivable for all debts and all dues except interest on the public debt and duties on imports, and that is stamped upon the bill itself. It is a contract between the people and the Government that these bills shall be a legal tender for all debts and all dues save and except only the interest on the public debt and duties on imports. There is a contract made between the Government and bill-holder. Now I want you or any other Senator to tell me with what kind of face you can say before this country that men who would vote to legalize $40,000,000 of greenbacks that the law authorizes and has authorized, will repudiate the bonded debt when it does not affect bonds, and will turn around and repeal the law which exists as a contract between the Government and the bill-holder that it shall be receivable for all debts and dues.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. Of course the greenbacks would be burned up only after the Government had redeemed them.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. And I would never repeal the legal-tender act so far as obligations now in existence are concerned, and therefore it could not affect the contract the Senator refers to at all.

Mr. LOGAN. But if you repeal the legal-tender act and then burn up the whole amount of the issue, what difference does it make to the debtor? You do not interfere with prior contracts, but you burn the money, and he must pay in gold the same as if the contract was made subject to repeal.

I say to-day, right in this Senate Chamber, that you will not repeal the legal-tender act, although you think you will. The people of this country will not fill this Chamber or the other with men who will repudiate that contract between the people and the Government, and you will find that you will fail when you attempt to do it. When you tell me that you will repeal the legal-tender act and burn up the legal-tender notes, I tell you you will burn up $382,000,000 of values in this country, and you reduce to that extent by $382,000,000 of values the property of the people of the United States of America. That is exactly the result. O, but you say you redeem them with gold and you put the gold in circulation. If it goes into the hands, then, of speculators and is hoarded, as it will be, you take that much from the circulation of the country. My own judgment is that the legal-tender notes should not be destroyed.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator permit me one word?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. When a man buys his own property is there anything to prevent his burning up his own property. Suppose he puts his note that he has paid into a stove and destroys it, is any value destroyed?

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that a man can burn up his own note and nobody objects to it; but if he burns his own house he is guilty of arson the same as if he burns his neighbor's house. There is no object in this burning up of legal-tenders. My theory is that they ought not to be burned up at all and ought not to be canceled except to the extent that this bill does it. Why? Because your law provides that they are made the medium of redemption for the national-bank currency of this country, and until you have gold sufficient for the redemption of the national-bank currency as well as the currency of your own Government, it would be bad faith to destroy one dollar of the amount that is necessary to float the circulation of the country for which they are the means and medium of redemption.

Mr. President, my friend from Vermont asked me what benefits are to be derived from this bill. I think I can tell him some. In the first place this bill opens the door and lets every association in this country have the same privileges that existing banking associations have at present. It does one thing: it strikes down a monopoly that is in antagonism with republican institutions. There is no theory upon which a monopoly of this kind can be maintained before an independent people; and whenever a man argues in this country that one man alone shall have the right to bank, he argues against the theory upon which this Government has been founded against the rights of an independent people. This monopoly is a great one and odious to the American people. This bill strikes down that monopoly, and does give the people of each State the same rights that the people of other States have. It does that, and in doing that it accomplishes a great good for and to the people of this country.

What else does it do? It performs the office that my friend from Nevada desires should be performed, of retiring $82,000,000 of the greenback currency. That $82,000,000 of greenback currency is to be in accordance with his theory destroyed; that is to say, it is canceled and the amount is credited to the sinking fund of the Government thereupon, while 5 per cent. interest is charged on the books and turned into the sinking fund, and in that way you save the Government from selling an interest-bearing bond to the public and taking for that the amount and putting it in the sinking fund. It adds to the amount that is redeemed 5 per cent. on the books, and that is credited to the sinking fund. Even in that there is a great change, a beneficial one, and one that is very advantageous in this particular.

There are two advantages. Let us see what the third is. You say you want to return to specie payments; you say the way to return to specie payments, or you have said so at least, is to take a step in that direction. This is a step in that direction, and you gentlemen who have denounced us here as inflationists (a term that you use in perversion of the true sense and meaning of what we advocated) have talked about the resumption of specie payments, and said we were opposed to it. Now we have tendered to you a proposition that is a step in the direction of specie payments, and in fact declares in favor of specie payments, and when you record yourselves against it, I tell you the tables are turned, and we shall see who are for specie payments and who are not in the legitimate and proper way, and in a way by which we would arrive at it instead of jumping clear off the roof of the house into the cellar. One grand Sam Patch leap is the way my friend from Nevada wishes to return to specie payment; he wishes to repeal the legal-tender act, to take effect one year from now; then he wants to redeem the balance of the greenbacks the year after and burn them up. Then I presume he wants a law passed declaring that no bill shall circulate of a less denomination than ten dollars, and in that way to have no currency in the country at all except that which comes from some of the gold mines that he or some other good friend owns.

Mr. JONES. I beg pardon, I have made no such statement here.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator has not stated it on the floor to-day, but I hope he will not deny that that is his favorite proposition. The statement has been made to the country over his own signature that he indorsed such a proposition, not to let the people of this country have anything less than a ten-dollar bill, and if they cannot get it, let them go without money. No, sir; the poor boy who goes to buy his loaf of bread must have the penny in his pocket; he cannot have anything of a paper character to purchase it. If a poor woman wants to buy five dollars' worth of goods of any kind, she must have the gold or the silver from the Nevada mines. We cannot afford to let her have a five-dollar bill. It is contrary to the theory of our wealthy friend, who deals in gold and silver alone.

You talk about repealing the legal-tender act, about burning up $382,000,000 of legal-tenders and then depriving the people of this country of having any money less than a ten dollar-bill. What is the result of this? What would be accomplished? In a year the result is bankruptcy, sheriff's sales, constable's sales. The rich men take possession of the poor men's property. The majority of the people become beggard as they were once in England, and a few landed-estate gentlemen obtain control of the whole property of the country. That is just what it means, and I tell you, gentlemen, when they go before this country with propositions like this, for the destruction of every interest in the country except the interest of the bondholder, or the wealthy merchant, or the rich banker, or the rich miner, they will find a voice coming from the hard-fisted yeomanry of this land that will make them shake and tremble in their boots.

Now, Mr. President, I am anxious, as I said, for this bill to be agreed to because it settles this question. If it is not agreed to, the whole question is then left open.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to ask a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. He says, if I understand him, that if this bill be passed it will settle this question. What question does he mean when he says it will settle this question?

Mr. LOGAN. I will explain what I mean. I mean it settles this finance question.

Mr. THURMAN. The question of what kind of currency we shall have? Is that the idea of the Senator?

Mr. LOGAN. We would have the same kind of currency that we have now.

Mr. THURMAN. That it will settle that, so that there will be no question about the currency then to be disposed of?

Mr. LOGAN. No power on earth can settle this matter so that there will be no question left open at all about the currency. I do not mean that; nobody would expect such a thing. I mean it settles this question that we have been debating here in the Senate, that we of the republican side have disagreed upon, and that you on the democratic side have disagreed upon.

Mr. THURMAN. Does it do that?

Mr. LOGAN. I think it does.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to read a few resolutions adopted by the grangers in his State yesterday?

Mr. LOGAN. I have read them and know what they are.

Mr. THURMAN. I think my friend after reading these resolutions will come to the conclusion that not one of those hard-fisted farmers for whom he spoke would vote for this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; those hard-fisted farmers the Senator speaks of have departed quite as far from his platform in those resolutions; so that he can take nothing by that move. He has nothing to expect from that source on the platform on which he has been standing all winter. So far as those resolutions are concerned, they cut no figure in this debate. I am speaking about the question before this Congress. I do not suppose any question, whether of finance or anything else, could be settled so as to suit every man in the country, or every party in the country, or every community of the country. I expect no such thing; but this bill will settle this question so far as this Congress is concerned and so far as this discussion is concerned.

Mr. THURMAN. May I ask, does it settle it with the Senator himself so that he will go back to his State and oppose the platform of the grangers' convention?

Mr. LOGAN. "Sufficient unto the day"——

Mr. THURMAN. "Is the evil thereof."

Mr. LOGAN. Yes. [Laughter.] I tell the Senator whenever I go on the stump I am about as independent a man as he is, and I take my own course. I do not propose to say what is settled with me or what is settled with anybody else. I say this bill, if passed, settles this vexed question here in Congress; and that is all we are trying to settle. So far as grangers are concerned and republicans are concerned and democrats are concerned, my friend from Ohio can settle his difficulty with them himself and need not call upon me. I will try to settle my own.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Illinois requested me to remind him if he should forget it to answer the question which I proposed pretty soon after he first rose to speak, and that was, whether he thought this bill would promote expansion or contraction.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not understand that to be the question. I understood the Senator to ask what advantages would be derived from this bill. But I can answer his last question, for I have nothing to conceal. I think this bill would give a small increase of currency. I do not think it would give any large amount; but I do think that many people in my State and in other States would bank under this bill; but I do not presume that it would increase the currency to any frightful extent, and have never thought so. I did not think so at the time the bill was before the Senate and was being discussed. I never have thought so.

But, Mr. President, as I have said, the passage of this bill would settle, in the first place, the question of monopoly so far as banking is concerned; second, it would settle the discussion of this vexed question here in Congress; third, in my judgment it would restore confidence to the people. Being settled for the time at least, business would go on smoothly and would revive all over the country. I believe that to be true. If I did not I would not advocate the bill.

The bill is not a satisfactory bill to me. I have said so all the time; but I will concede my opinions so far as any one else will on a distracting question that divides communities or parties or peoples. I am always willing to do that for the purpose of settling it, for the reason that I do not think I made the world by a great deal, and hence I do not think I know all that is known in it. I am willing to take the opinions of other men, as well as to be guided by my own opinions. When I find experienced men, business men, men of great intellect and learning willing to concede their opinions for the purpose of compromise, and they believe this is a good measure, one at least from which benefits will be derived, I am willing to say that I will abandon for the moment the opinions that I have had in reference to this question for the purpose of making this settlement.

My friend from Ohio was very anxious to know what my position was in reference to the grangers. The grangers have not inquired of me as to my opinion; but I will say to him that this bill would settle a question in his State as well as it would settle one in mine. It would settle a question between him and his friends as well as between me and my friends. We do not all think alike. We cannot all think the same way. If I thought I was as great a man as the Senator from Ohio is thought to be, probably I would think in the same line as he does; but yielding that palm to him, and desiring not to measure strength of intellect with a man of such a gigantic frame of mind, I am free to say that I might defer to him on some questions. But, sir, I think it would be well enough sometimes for some of the great minds in this country to stoop and consider the thoughts of men whom they look upon as lower in the scale of thought than themselves. We may sometimes learn wisdom from the weak and the feeble, sometimes from the ignorant, and we often do. Some of the greatest managers and maneuverers of this age or any other have taken lessons and learned much wisdom from men whom they consider much their inferiors. I could appeal for proof of this statement to one of the greatest marshals who lives to-day—General Sherman. He learned many things of great value on the field from the private soldiers as he passed by, hearing their views and opinions. It would be well for many men sometimes to stoop to take lessons from those whom they wish to control, and whom they do sometimes influence and control.

Now, sir, I desire to appeal to our friends on both sides of this Chamber and ask why not act in a spirit of concession? Why not let us act one with another here as though we were mortals of generous impulses and kind natures? Why not act one with another here as though each and every one of us did not think that he alone made up this mighty hemisphere? Let us consider that other men think for themselves, that other men have minds, thoughts, and judgment in matters of business as well as of public policy. Let us agree that we all may be wrong at times, and that it is not only good for the community for concessions to be made, but it shows a generosity among men who are wont to act together when they can.

I have said that I believed this bill would settle this vexed question. I believe it would be better for the left of this Chamber if it was settled, so far as their little feuds are concerned, and better for the country. I know it would be better for us all around, not as a question of politics, but to take a great disputed question, a cause of aggravation, from this arena. Let it go back settled to the people and let them conform to it, because in my judgment they would do it.

Now, Mr. President, let us for a moment cast our eye over this country. But a short period has elapsed since we could hear the hum of the busy spindle on the many little rippling streams in New England and all over the land. But a short time since we could see the curling smoke rising heavenward from a thousand furnaces and the blaze coming forth all over this land. We could hear the trip-hammers and the machinery at work all through Pennsylvania and in many places in my own State. We could hear the car-wheels turning out and the railroad iron pouring forth from the iron manufactories and rolling-mills almost everywhere, producing millions and making wealth for our land. We could hear the discussions between the people in reference to their prosperity, in reference to their wealth, in reference to the growth and the mighty onward march of this great American people. We could see, as our flag was unfurled, the bright and gleaming faces of men and women, as they shouted "hallelujah" to that flag that is now held up and borne and bears sway throughout this land once dissevered and disunited. Thank God, it has now become one united whole! Happiness and peace reigned everywhere.

To-day what does the eye witness and the ear hear? You hear of the smoke ceasing, of the fires growing dim over the land. You hear of bankruptcy in furnaces, in rolling-mills, and manufactories everywhere. You hear of the foreclosure of mortgages. You hear of some of the best men in the Northwest and other portions of the Union being sold out for a mere pittance; and why? Because the business interests of this country are disturbed; they are in commotion; the elements of business are in confusion; they are in turmoil. In my judgment this bill would prove a salve, and would smooth the ruffled surface, and give prosperity again to this country; it would restore confidence to the people, and confidence among the people is worth more than money. That is one of the needs to-day.

But if you refuse to adopt this report, you throw us again upon a boisterous sea of confusion in the business of this land. You compel us again to plow the mighty billows of distress and misfortune until we pass through the turmoil and excitement of another election to send a Congress here to do what? To quarrel over this same question just as we have quarreled over it for five months. That will be the result, in my judgment, if you refuse to adopt this compromise that is made here between these committees. If there is a Senator here who is not willing to defer to the views of other Senators sufficiently to adopt this compromise, that Senator is willing to go back into the bitter strife that exists in our various communities on this subject, and to go through the same tumult and confusion that we have all witnessed and deprecated often.

Hence I appeal to the good intentions of Senators and to their generosity and to that yielding spirit that ought to belong to man, for us to yield our opinions sufficiently in conferring together to agree to this proposition and settle this question once for all.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I hope my friend from Illinois did not conceive the idea that the question I put to him manifested any want of respect either for him personally or for his judgment.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all, my dear friend.

Mr. THURMAN. I certainly cannot say that I have ever underrated either his talent or his ability. I am not accustomed to do that in respect to any man, and certainly not in respect to a gentleman with whom my relations have always been most kind.

But when he said the passage of this bill would settle this question, I was anxious to know what question he meant. If he simply meant that it would settle the question what shall the Congress of the United States do at this present session, then I grant that the passage of the bill would settle that, for after the passage of the bill nothing more would be done on this subject at this session. But if that were all that the bill were to effect it would be a very small matter, and I conceived therefore that he meant it would settle this vexed question of the currency not only in this Congress but with the people of the United States. If the bill would have that effect, if it would have the effect to cause people to stop talking about what kind of money they will have and go to work and earn money, it would be a very powerful recommendation of this measure.

But will this bill, if you pass it, have that effect? Will it stop discussion on the currency question? Will it bring all the people to one mind? I fancy it will have no such effect, and the reason is very plain. There are in this country a set of men, and events show that they are growing very fast, who insist that the precious metals shall be demonetized, that the gold basis, as it has been called, shall be utterly abolished, that gold and silver shall be a mere article of commerce, and that the currency of this country shall consist in paper alone. That being the case, what is to be that paper currency? Here is a division of opinion. One set say it ought to consist of bank paper and bank paper alone. The other set say it ought to consist of Government obligations alone, greenbacks alone. There is where they split.

Now, which side is likely to be the stronger on that question? Which side, at least, is likely to produce the most excitement on that question? We have heard the Senator from Illinois to-day speak about this bank monopoly, and he said very truly that it was not the less a monopoly because it might be in the hands of two thousand men. It is a monopoly if its benefits are confined to those who alone have the pecuniary means to avail themselves of the benefit of the law. Therefore that argument will not be diminished against monopoly and against the existence of the national banks, or at least their function of issuing paper money, which is the only function they have that is not possessed by every one in this community—every private banker can do everything that the national bank can do except issue his promissory notes. This cry against them of monopoly instead of ceasing by the passage of this bill which looks to making bank paper the only paper currency in the country, will be increased perhaps tenfold. The consequence will be that the other school of currency men, those who insist that the only paper currency shall be Government currency based on the credit of the Government, will insist on that, make their platforms on that, nominate their candidates on those platforms, and go to the country for a decision. There is no avoiding it.

The real question that this country has to settle, and that it may take some years to settle, that cannot be avoided by any legislation we may adopt here, is the question whether or not you will demonetize the precious metals and have a wholly irredeemable paper currency in all time to come, or whether you will have that currency of specie or specie-paying paper which the experience of all commercial nations for hundreds of years has said is the only safe currency for the country.

I was rejoiced to hear my friend from Illinois say that there was no man on the floor of the Senate who was not in favor of a resumption of specie payments. I am glad to hear that; but that will be strange news to a great many people in Illinois. It will be very strange news to the three thousand grangers who assembled in convention at Indianapolis in Indiana yesterday, and who passed this resolution, as reported in the papers:

> They declare the gold-basis fallacy should be abandoned, call for an unlimited issue of Government currency, and the withdrawal of all bank and local currency.

That is the resolution of three thousand grangers in convention assembled in Indiana and who passed other resolutions and nominated a State ticket. How was it in the Senator's own State? Their platform "demands the repeal of the national-bank law, and favors the issue of Government notes, interchangeable for bonds bearing a low rate of interest." That is the platform upon which they go. It is what is familiarly called the Kelley bill—a currency which is never to be paid, but is simply to be interchangeable for bonds of the United States at a lower rate of interest, under the idea that by such a currency you may reduce the rate of interest to as low a figure as you please. The bill to which I alluded I believe makes the rate of interest 3.65 per cent; but with equal logic it might have made it ¼ of 1 per cent. The logic of it would be that you may by making a bond convertible into currency and the currency reconvertible into a bond fix the rate of interest in a commercial country simply by fixing the rate of interest that the bond shall bear; for if a man has a bond, all he has to do is to go and get the greenbacks for the bond, paying ¼ per cent. interest only. All he has got to do is to turn it into greenbacks, and his money costs him but ¼ of 1 per cent. So the logic of it is that it is in the power of legislation absolutely, by means of this convertible bond, to fix the rate of interest just as low as you please. That is the favorite idea with a large and growing party in this country, that you are to have that wholly irredeemable currency, except redemption in the bonds of the United States, which signifies a perpetual debt of the United States. That is the favorite idea with them, and the passage of this bill, instead of satisfying them, will only put a measure upon your statute-book which they will antagonize and oppose with all their might and strength, and sooner or later you will find that the only safety is to go back to those sound principles which have the indorsement of the experience of the world for more than three centuries, and which have the approbation of every sound and clear-headed writer on this subject that ever took a pen in hand.

The passage of this bill will not therefore settle this question at all. On the contrary, this bill will be looked upon as pledging the Government to perpetuate this bank monopoly, as it is called. It will be looked upon as a bill antagonistic to everything but the interests of the banks. It will be looked upon as a bill which pledges itself to maintain and perpetuate the national-bank system; and, instead of giving peace to the country, it will only be a fresh brand thrown into the fire to increase the conflagration that already exists.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. I was not done; but the Senator looks so inviting and is apparently so full on this subject that I will stop. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. Thank you. Mr. President, I have been reading this finance bill, and I do not know certainly whether I understand it or not. I do not know whether it is such a bill as anybody can understand. Perhaps it is owing to my want of intelligence; I do not know about that. I think somebody ought to be able to explain it and state distinctly what it means. I have not heard anybody do that, and I do not believe anybody can.

The first portion of the bill is intended to secure free banking. That may be very well, but if it succeeds, it will secure inflation undoubtedly. If that first part of the bill can be executed, without regard to the eighth section, we shall have plenty of paper money. Now, at first sight my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] came to the conclusion that the free-banking part of the bill could not be executed, for the reason that bonds would be brought down to the value of greenbacks in 1878, and therefore, they being at a premium now above greenbacks of some 10 or 12 per cent., a person having greenbacks could not afford to buy the bonds and go to bank with them. That would be true if the eighth section could be executed. But suppose the eighth section cannot be executed at all and will not enhance the value of greenbacks or depreciate the bonds, then there is no impediment in the bill to free banking and on a very extended scale. Is not that so? If it was not for the eighth section, there would be plenty of inflation in this bill. I believe anybody will agree that it is entirely unlimited.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for one moment?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I simply wish to deliver a small codicil to my last will and testament that I want to go into the record. A great deal has been said about the want of currency in this country, and about that being the cause of all our troubles. I hold in my hand a manual of railroads in the United States, a book compiled with great care, and I find that since 1866 there have been built and put into operation in the United States 30,277 miles of railroad. The number of miles in operation in 1866 was 36,827. The amount now in operation is 67,104, being an increase of 30,277 miles in eight years. And yet it is said that a country that can build in eight years nearly as many miles of railroad as it had before built in fifty years is suffering for want of currency!

Mr. STEWART. That is a very good commentary upon the present condition of things. But, as I was about to remark, it will be agreed on all hands that if it were not for the eighth section this would be an unlimited inflation bill. If there was no impediment in that, anybody could bank that pleased; there is no limit to the bank-notes that might be put out.

Now, let us examine the eighth section, and see what the operation of this bill will be.

That on and after the 1st day or January, 1878, any holder of United States notes to the amount of fifty dollars, or any multiple thereof, may present them for payment at the office of the Treasurer of the United States, or at the office of the assistant treasurer at the city of New York; and thereupon he shall be entitled to receive, at his option, from the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized and required to issue in exchange for said notes an equal amount of either class of the coupon or registered bonds of the United States provided for, &c.

That would be the 5 per cent. coupon bonds that have been negotiated heretofore. Now let us stop right there. There is a positive provision for redeeming your legal-tenders and returning to specie payments. Let us see how we can do that. That part of it could be executed if there was not anything else in the section; but hear now what the Secretary has got to do in case he does that—not "may" but must:

Which bonds shall continue to be exempt from taxation as provided in said act: Provided—

Now look at the proviso: First, the Secretary may redeem in 5 per cent. bonds the legal-tender notes that are presented. That he can do if there is no impediment in the way of doing it—

Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury in lieu of such bonds may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States.

That is, he may do that if he has got the gold and is able to do it. Nobody supposes he has got the gold, or is going to have it, to do any such thing. He is not required to buy the gold, and nobody supposes there is anything in that clause. That part of it is merely ornamental, embroidery, a flourish. Now comes what he "shall" do:

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue the United States notes so received either in exchange for coin at par—

That we know he cannot do, for they will not be at par. He cannot get gold at par for United States notes.

Mr. SHERMAN. How do you assume that?

Mr. STEWART. How do I assume that? Because right on your statute-books you have got a repudiation of these greenbacks. You require your duties to be collected in gold. You have made no provision for the retirement of the greenbacks, and of course they will not be at par. You cannot get gold for them. That part of the section is entirely ornamental or embroidery—or, with the consent of the holder, in the redemption of bonds then redeemable at par.

Everybody knows that cannot be done, because the gold-bearing bonds will be above par. What else can he do with it then?

Or in the purchase of bonds at not less than par.

Of course he cannot purchase the bonds, for the bonds are above par in greenbacks and will be until the greenbacks are respected, until the Government will receive them for all its claims. As long as the Government dishonors them, it is all nonsense to talk about their being at par; so that the Secretary cannot buy any bonds, and therefore that is all ornamental entirely and has no meaning:

Or to meet the current payments for the public service.

That he may do. He can pay them out just as quick as he chooses. There is no doubt about that. Now, if you stop right here the bill will be executed and there will be no doubt about it. All that will be necessary then will be to see that you have public expenses enough. Then you can go on building railroads to the moon if you please; you can do anything you have got a mind to do, because the country would have no place to put these bonds and they will come just as fast as you put them out in order to get the gold upon them. You can put them out for all sorts of projects and multiply your debt until your gold bonds are swamped, until the credit of the Government is entirely undermined and the gold bond will not be good for anything, and thus destroying the credit of the Government. You eventually lead to repudiation.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator has voted for this very proposition in substance not less than a dozen times.

Mr. STEWART. That shows my want of intelligence, that is all. [Laughter.] If I ever cast any vote of that kind I did not know it. But here is a provision that will trouble the Secretary of the Treasury to execute the law:

And when used to meet current payments an equal amount of the gold in the Treasury shall be applied in redemption of the bonds known as five-twenty bonds.

It all depends upon his being able to do that. An equal amount shall be applied to the redemption of the bonds of the United States known as the five-twenty bonds. What is the effect of that? You say that the surplus of gold is about forty millions a year.

Mr. SHERMAN. One hundred millions.

Mr. STEWART. Well, what would be the effect of this? You would have five thousand millions coming in, because they will come in just as fast as they can run them in and run them out. As long as gold bonds are worth more than currency they would come right back. You would have five or six hundred millions as fast as you could get them out.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to correct the Senator at this point. He will see that the Secretary cannot pay out the notes so received except for current expenses, &c. In the first place those current expenses are limited by the actual appropriations by Congress. No money can be paid out of the Treasury except in pursuance of an act of Congress, and it is to be presumed that the Senator from Nevada among others would take care how it goes out. As a matter of course it is confined to the payment of ordinary expenses.

The Senator also admits here that we have a surplus revenue; in our present condition a very small surplus, but we have it. Our revenue amounts to $200,000,000 in gold, and $100,000,000 in paper money, in round numbers. Our currency expenses amount to about $150,000,000. Consequently the Secretary has got $100,000,000 currency revenue flowing in from taxes, and $100,000,000 surplus gold revenue after paying the interest account. Now I should like to know how much would be paid out in the course of a year under that clause? The whole amount of currency expenses being $150,000,000, and you have, from other sources, $100,000,000, how much could be paid out?

Mr. STEWART. You could pay out $100,000,000, exactly the surplus gold, and that is exactly the amount, because you have got to pay out all you receive in. That is the way to execute that section. In the first part of the section you say to all the world: "Come forward with your greenbacks and you shall receive gold," and then when they come forward you give out bonds for them; and when you have paid out $100,000,000 of bonds you have got to pay out $100,000,000 of gold, and when you have paid out $100,000,000 of gold you have got no more surplus. You cannot receive any more, and have got to repudiate. In the first place you promise to receive them all, and then you show you can receive but $100,000,000 a year, and that same $100,000,000 is paid right out and comes back again the next year. That is all there is of it. The $100,000,000 are paid again and they come back the next year, and if you could receive all that would come there would be a constant flow; you cannot name the number of millions that would go through as long as the bond is worth more than the greenback. As long as the bond is worth more than the greenback people will be clamoring for the bond, and according to your own showing you can receive only $100,000,000 of them. When you have received that $100,000,000, and that is gone out again, you have $400,000,000 clamoring at your door and no capacity in the Secretary of the Treasury to receive them.

Mr. LOGAN. Why did you not discover that before?

Mr. STEWART. I discover it here now. I am ignorant of finance, I know. I claim no knowledge about it.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask why did the Senator so strongly support that proposition when the Senator from Ohio reported it in his bill and we opposed it? It was a good thing then; how does it come to be so bad now? You voted for it time and again.

Mr. STEWART. I do not remember ever doing anything of the kind. I never saw a proposition of this kind before. If there has ever been such a proposition that I have voted for, I acknowledge myself very stupid. I never saw such a proposition, and my vote for it cannot be produced, I think.

Here is a provision whereby you say to the world, "Come on with your greenbacks and we will redeem them," and you you can only redeem $100,000,000; and you go on putting these out again till you have the $400,000,000 all out again. You will have a row of men all the way from New York to the Treasury jamming each other to get there first. [Laughter.] And the man who gets there first will get the bonds and the rest will not get any. There is no contraction because the $400,000,000 go right out again. You have a little bait in it for a year so as to get the fish around. That is all. You drag the bait in the water and bring them all around again.

There is no possible way of executing the first clause of the section, because you cannot redeem all the notes. You are limited in your redemption of notes to what gold you pay out for the redemption of bonds. Then the only effect of this section is this: the gold that you pay out goes in redemption of five-twenties, and the bonds that you lay in are so much refunding of the debt. That is all there is of it. The operation of it will simply be the refunding of the five-twenties that the Government has a right to redeem, being now due, into a 5 per cent. bond as far as it has any operation. I do not believe it is going to affect the price of bonds so as to prevent free banking, because this kind of a promise which has got to be repudiated every day will not have a tendency to raise the price of your bonds and men can buy them with greenbacks cheap enough for banking purposes. There is nothing in the eighth section but what goes right again into circulation. You go in and come out at the same hole you went in.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like to ask a question, if the Senator will allow me to do so.

Mr. STEWART. Yes, except a question about my financial record, for I have none. Any question about this bill I will try to answer.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask the Senator whether he has not complained of the irredeemability of United States notes?

Mr. STEWART. I have.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I would ask the Senator, then, what his plan would be to remedy that irredeemability?

Mr. STEWART. To redeem them.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. In what?

Mr. STEWART. In money.

Mr. SHERMAN. Where will you get it?

Mr. STEWART. Earn it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator has so far categorically answered my questions, but I still pursue him. The Senator says that he is opposed to the greenbacks because they are not redeemable. He says to remedy that irredeemability he would redeem them in coin. Now, this section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury in his option shall redeem them in coin, and if the Secretary has coin there will be no bonds issued. Now, I ask the Senator, if the Secretary of the Treasury holds that option, what complaint can he make of the section which gives him the right to issue coin instead of bonds?

Mr. STEWART. Gives him the right? Ah! It says he "may" do one thing and he "shall" do another thing.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator from Nevada is not to escape the point of my question in that way.

Mr. STEWART. I do not want to escape it or you.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I confine him to the phraseology of the clause which he has so facetiously criticised. The committee did put in the word "may" that the Secretary of the Treasury might hold the option; when he found that he had coin, he could use the coin instead of the bond. The reason why they left the option with the Secretary of the Treasury was that there might not come a time when by the failure of coin on hand the United States notes would still be irredeemable as they now are in the judgment of the Senator from Nevada. It was to make that very irredeemability cease that the committee provided that either in coin or bond the Secretary should have power to redeem. He has the right to use coin if there be coin in the Treasury. Thus the irredeemability of the bill is to cease and the notes become redeemable, and thus at par in coin in the judgment of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I wish I had as good language to answer you as the bill uses. Let me read it. I do not believe anybody can state it equal to that:

Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury in lieu of such bonds may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue—

That he must do—

the United States notes so received.

Those reissued are not redeemed. It is not paying a debt to give your note again for it; it is just changing it; you keep out just as many notes that are not redeemed.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. What are they to be issued for?

Mr. STEWART. Reissued for the purpose of getting more out—for the purpose of inflation. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. After the Senator has got through his laugh, let me ask how is he to get the issue out unless something goes in?

Mr. STEWART. You can get out one hundred millions a year by this bill and take just that amount in, and there is just as much paper out not redeemed at the end of the year as there was at the beginning. Certainly he cannot get it out unless he shall get something in. You provide for one hundred millions coming in, and that he shall put it out again. He shall put out the amount he takes in, so your bill says. That balances the books perfectly; there is no trouble about it. [Laughter.] This bill is automatic entirely.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. Suppose we had no paper currency, but only gold——

Mr. STEWART. I wish that supposition was true. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. In all candor, I desire to ask would the Senator object to the Secretary issuing gold in any quantity at any time on that basis?

Mr. STEWART. No; then you can have any quantity that you can get and pay for.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not talking about buying and paying for anything; but the Senator would not restrict the Secretary in paying out gold?

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. LOGAN. Now if the greenback is redeemed in gold and thereby becomes as good as gold, what is the difference between issuing that and gold, if it is worth gold and is much more convenient than the gold?

Mr. STEWART. Everything is very convenient here.

Mr. LOGAN. It is very easy to laugh; but if you do not believe in restricting gold when paper is equal to gold, I ask you upon what policy you restrict the paper?

Mr. STEWART. Do you speak of restricting paper when gold is behind it?

Mr. LOGAN. When it is redeemed in gold and put out and our bonds taken in, and it is redeemable in gold again the next day, and is thus equal to gold, I ask what is the difference between buying bonds with it and buying them with gold?

Mr. STEWART. I supposed everybody knew that the Government was going to collect revenue in gold so as to pay the interest on the bonded debt and meet expenses. When you adopt a system by which the Government keeps out its $400,000,000 of paper, or whatever it is, and there is just as much paper circulation besides as the banks choose to keep out, and you do not receive the greenbacks for all taxes but repudiate them for the purpose of collecting gold, when you keep out the full amount of greenbacks and take off the limit on your national banks—I did not think anybody supposed greenbacks would ever be equal to gold under such a system. I did not suppose that would be a question that could be raised under this bill. This is a bill for unlimited expansion, and it seems to me the working of it to keep up unlimited expansion is entirely automatic. I do not think it needs comment; I think it explains itself.

This shows the difficulty in attempting to reconcile things that are perfectly irreconcilable. It is laid down in the books that things which are equal to the same thing are equal to each other. That is one of the axioms; and this is a proposition to try to disprove that axiom. I know of only one mathematical mode of doing it, involving one formula in mathematics, and that is the proposition (whenever it may occur in mathematics) which involves dividing nothing by nothing. There you produce an indeterminate quality by a purely mathematical rule. I can prove here by mathematical rule of algebra that 2 is equal to 4 if you allow me to so arrange the proposition that I shall have in it somewhere nothing divided by nothing. This attempt to make a piece of paper that is worth nothing something valuable, to make it like gold when it does not represent gold, is idle, and you cannot do it. You may fix up all the propositions you please, but the real thing is, when you come down to it finally—I do not care how much you discusss it or how many resolutions you pass; they do not make any difference; you must come to the same conclusion that all other people have—that gold is recognized as the universal standard of value. It is the measure that must be used. It is the measure by which your wealth must be tested; and whether it be pennies or millions matters not; it is the measure that must test all wealth. The wealth of the United States is tested by the same rule. It has been and always will be the touchstone of measurement; and when you depart from that and try to figure up any other measure which the world does not recognize, you get into confusion. Attempting to reconcile them it is idle to talk about. It is idle to talk about compromising on any other measure of value; the world will not accept it. We have the experience of every nation that has tried it; and it has been tried in almost every civilized nation. The art of substituting something else for money has been tried in Europe and it has failed everywhere. The only way that we can have honest dealing is to use an honest measure. The only way that we can determine what is the value of a man's labor is to measure it by an honest measure. That is what the granger needs; that is what the laboring man needs. He needs that his toil shall be measured by no uncertain measure. He wants it measured by that measure which will tell him the truth. When he has worked and earned a dollar, he wants a dollar in money with the purchasing power of a dollar in money with which he can buy bread. That is his due. If you give him anything else, you give him a false measure with which jugglers can operate and he is cheated. All your contrivances to evade the universal measure of value are cheating the unwary and robbing the public and leading them to false expectations. It is the greatest sin that can be committed to teach the American people that money can be printed not earned. That doctrine may take for a time. There may be organizations of men who will be deluded by it; but they have got to be disappointed, and a sore disappointment it will be to them. Do not let us try to deceive the American people; do not let us try to make them believe by some hocus-pocus of legislation that we can give them something of real value, we can give them a measure of value that is better than the universal standard of mankind. Do not deceive them in that regard. Let them know the facts now. They are a brave people and they will meet the issue. Every device you resort to will embarrass them; every hope you hold out that you can relieve them by these devices will be a sore disappointment and they must suffer for it. They are suffering now. They are suffering now by the devices already in operation. All the shaves and all the tricks of the money-dealers come ultimately upon labor; it has to pay for them. When millions can be accumulated by means of these devices in the commercial centers, those millions are drawn directly from labor, and the laboring man is compelled to take an uncertain measure of value, and when he has got a dollar and expects to buy what will feed his family and obtain the value of a dollar, he gets something at an inflated price that leaves him to starvation. He sends you a petition for more money, not because he has not had enough, but because what he got did not have the capacity to buy his bread; and so it will go on. A dollar in the laboring man's hands should have the full capacity to buy a dollar's worth. Do not call anything else a dollar. Let him understand it.

This is not a new question. It has been discussed by abler men than we are in a former generation; it has been discussed here; and it was after a severe struggle decided that the laboring man was entitled and that the producers of this country were entitled to have their products and their labor measured by a correct rule. Apply no other.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, hardly anything remains for those who are opposed to this measure except to protest and record their votes against it. Before I proceed to state the views I entertain, I desire to ask the honorable Senator from Indiana if either the committee or he himself has made an estimate which he will submit to the Senate and to the country of the probable increase of bank circulation that will be the result of the passage of this bill.

Mr. MORTON. I have made no estimate on that subject, and the committee made no calculation in regard to how fast this circulation would be taken up.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Senator represents a section of the country where as it is understood the necessity exists for an increase of banking capital and circulation, and I think when we are called to pass upon a measure which offers, we may say, speaking in general terms, unlimited facilities for the increase of bank circulation, the committee, whose advice we are to follow if we move in that direction at all, should favor us with an opinion upon the question, which is really the vital question in determining what ought to be done.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me, as I have had some curiosity on that subject, to give him the result of the calculation I have made on that very question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should be glad to have it, and I hope also we shall have the benefit of the judgment of the committee as well.

Mr. SCOTT. I am not assuming to answer for the committee, but as the interrogatory was put and the same question struck me, I made this calculation. The act of 1870 authorizes the issue of $54,000,000 additional-bank currency. It took four years say in round numbers to get out that in the States which by the terms of that law were authorized to apply for it. I put it in round numbers at $14,000,000 a year, although that is a little more than it was. Of course this would authorize the issuing of national-bank currency in all the States, not simply these which have a deficiency; and in order to retire the $82,000,000 provided for by this bill, it would require the issue of $18,666,666.66⅔ of national-bank notes. If we say that double the amount each year will be issued under this bill that was issued during the time the deficient States were authorized to take out the $54,000,000, it would take about seven and a half years to issue the $218,000,000 which would be required for the purpose of retiring the $23,000,000. This is the only direction in which I made this calculation, and if this be any basis for the calculation, that would be the result upon the experience with reference to the $54,000,000.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the Senator from Indiana will give us the benefit of his opinion on that point, I shall be exceedingly obliged to him.

Mr. MORTON. I will try to do so before this debate is over. I am not prepared to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. A good deal of the ground has been occupied in times past, and I do not propose to go over it again. If this bill be not calculated to increase the volume of currency in the country, then I suppose it is not calculated to answer the expectations of those who favor it. For one, I am opposed to any increase in the volume of paper money. We to-day, I think, settle the question whether the resolutions of the grangers of Illoinois, which I may say without disrespect either to the Senator who referred to them or to the Senate were rather contemptuously introduced to our notice, are to be the policy of the land. We are at a point where the roads separate. If to-day, when there is confessedly a volume of paper currency greater than the wants or the interests of the country require or justify, we have not the power to resist an increase in the volume, how is it to be expected that either we or our successors, when this volume shall have been increased and the difficulties under which we labor and which gave rise to the public sentiment that is expressed by those resolutions of Illinois are augmented, shall be able to resist the demand that will be then made? If while the difficulties are few they cannot be overcome if when the obstacle is slight it cannot be removed, how are the difficulties to be overcome when they are multiplied, or the obstacles to be removed when they are increased? The difficulty to-day is that we have paper money which is not of equal value with coin. And now if this bill mean anything, if it contain any policy for the future, it is a policy of expansion; and a policy of expansion is detrimental to every interest, and especially injurious to the laboring people of the country,

While I have stood and stand to-day, if I may so assume, the opponent of a specific movement in any direction with reference to the volume of currency, I am persistently, and I mean to be continuously opposed, under any and every condition of things, and against any and every manifestation of public sentiment in this country, to any increase in the volume of paper money until it is made equivalent in value to coin; and on no other foundation can the industry and the policy of this country rest. While I concede to those who differ in opinion entire honesty of purpose, I feel for myself that history teaches nothing, that principle is of no consequence, that our own bitter experience during the war has been lost upon us and upon the country that we represent, if now in time of peace we embark upon a policy of inflation. If this policy is in obedience to a public sentiment, it is a misdirected public sentiment which we in our places, as the representatives of the country, should meet upon principle and either correct or fall beneath its misguided power.

The bill in its unmistakable features, about which there can be no difference of opinion, lets loose a portion of the reserve heretofore held by the banks and not available for circulation or for business purposes, and does increase the volume of paper money for business purposes. If we stand where we are, I believe it is the judgment of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance that the progress toward the equalization of paper and coin is 3½ per cent. per annum. It certainly is something. If we stand where we are without increasing the volume of paper money the progress toward resumption is something. If we accept this bill we turn our faces and the policy and the power of the country in the opposite direction. Does any man doubt that? We have a certain volume of paper money and it is below par. Why? Because there are too many dollars of paper now; for no other reason. The credit of the country is well established; it is respected at home and abroad; and when we find a United States note nominally a dollar, of less value than a dollar of gold, we know it is because there are too many of those paper dollars in proportion to the coin and the business of the country. But if you hold the volume of paper where it is, with the increase of population and business and the increase of uses to which money is applied you gradually work out by slow degrees the problem that we are called to consider—the equalization of the value of paper and coin. But by this bill according to the admission of the chairman of the committee the first effect is that you increase the volume of paper money for practical purposes twenty-six and a half million dollars, and you have just to that extent, upon the admitted and unquestioned policy of this bill, departed so far from the opportunity to resume specie payments.

What next? Here is an opportunity for increasing the volume of paper money through banks to the extent of $1,100,000,000. We shall be told, and told with truth, that the people of this country will not avail themselves of this opportunity to that extent, that they have not the means of doing so. Very well; but they have the means of doing something. You give them the opportunity. You say that it is lawful to do it. By your act you say that it is a wise thing, that it should be done, because it is a reflection upon the judgment of Congress to say that it would pass a law providing that certain things may be done and believe at the same time that it was unwise for the people, to whom the opportunity is given, to do those things which Congress has authorized to be done. Therefore this bill goes to the country with the sanction of Congress that it is wise to increase the volume of paper money, that it is judicious, that it is a policy that Congress approves. It is a step which is certain to be taken by a number of people; how many no man can say; how rapidly no one can predict, but the direction we know; it is in the direction of postponing the time when it will be possible to resume specie payments; and just so far as the opinions, or the interests, or the necessities, or the caprices of the people may lead them in that direction, this Congress becomes responsible to the country and to the world for the effects of this policy.

Mr. President, I am not an alarmist; but I do believe that in this measure, if it be enacted into a law, are the germs of a growth whose fruit in less than four years shall poison every branch of industry, which shall paralyze every enterprise, which shall lay low every undertaking, and that confusion and panic and distress will wait upon the people of this broad land. I know, if I can be certain of anything in the future, that an increase in the volume of paper money, based upon a condition of things when it is less valuable than gold, pursued by a multitude of people with purposes united but whose power when combined cannot be predicted, must end, as every such enterprise has ended, in stimulating speculation, in leading people to embark in hazardous and disastrous enterprises, in panic, in the depression of industry, in the prostration of business, in the bankruptcy of commerce and commercial men.

It may be said that these things will not happen because the opportunity you give the people will not be accepted. That is no excuse for us. At this moment we are bound to deny to the people an opportunity to do that which if done must end in injury to them.

If you look at the details of this bill, and especially to the eighth and ninth sections, I think it must be seen that it is fraught with evils from which the country cannot escape. I have before commented upon a proposition submitted by the Senator from Ohio similar to the provisions contained in the eighth section of this bill. I concur in a good deal that was said by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] in reference to that section.

When the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] was presenting to the Senate this morning the views of the committee, I inquired of him why the day for the transfer or the conversion of United States notes into United States bonds was postponed until the year 1878, and the answer I received was that the difference now between the value of notes and bonds was so great that the country could not bear the shock of the opportunity to convert them immediately.

Mr. MORTON. Not "notes and bonds." "Notes and coin," I said.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I tried to ascertain from the honorable Senator what grounds he had for believing that in 1876 or 1877 the difference would be less, and I failed to obtain from him any answer to that inquiry. I am prepared to say that just to the extent that the free banking provisions of this bill are used by the people, just to that extent will it be more difficult in 1875, more difficult still in 1876, more difficult still in 1877, and more difficult yet on the 1st of January, 1878, to do the thing that is proposed in this bill. The Senator from Ohio tells us that if this bill be passed, the faith of the country is to be pledged to this policy and that no Congress sitting here between now and 1878 can without a violation of the public faith repeal this statute. If that doctrine be accepted, this country is to be put into a financial strait-jacket in the year 1878 on the 1st of January, for if the difference between coin and paper shall remain what it is, or if the difference shall widen under this policy of expansion, as I have no doubt it will, then we are met by the doctrine on the one hand that this statute is not to be repealed because the public faith has been pledged to it and we are to be compelled to accept results in 1877 and 1878, magnified by the policy growing out of the free-banking system, results greater than those which would be apprehended if this policy were immediate, and the policy if immediate is so revolting that even the committee dare, not ask Congress and the country now to accept it.

But, sir, this eighth section has in it consequences more disastrous even than any to which I have called attention. It transfers the financial power of this country, under the iron rule of this eighth section, not to be repealed, not only from the Treasury Department, but from Congress, and not only to Wall street in the city of New York and to speculators and jobbers on this continent, but to speculators and money-changers throughout Europe. If the difference in 1877 between greenbacks and coin be what it now is, and the credit of the country shall be maintained, as I have no doubt it will be, and 5 per cent. bonds shall be at par in coin, there will come a time—I cannot say when; it will come early or late in proportion to the difference between coin and paper—but there will come a time when that difference, whether it be 1 per cent. or 10 per cent. or 20 per cent. or 30 per cent. will be an inducement to the people to gather up greenbacks, because on the 1st day of January, 1878, these greenbacks can be converted into coin bonds, which coin bonds in the markets of this country and of Europe are worth par in gold. And when that times arrives, let those who have been responsible for this measure take heed that day. When the people of this country, stimulated by greed and helped by the financial power of Europe, shall gather up greenbacks for the purposes of speculation and withdraw them from circulation, let those take heed when the banks without the means of redemption, the volume of the paper and the volume of their liabilities immensely increased, tumble one after another because they have neither gold nor greenbacks with which they can respond to the demand of the people upon them. When you invite the money-power of the world to combine for the purpose of making gain out of your policy, and the chairman of the Finance Committee says that in the presence of these dangers that policy shall never be changed, let men take heed who this day become responsible for this measure, which, if adhered to, has all these woes and more for the people of this country. But I know perfectly well that when that day approaches there will be a public sentiment that will demand the repeal of this measure, because men will see that they cannot stand the shock when the money-power of the world is combined for the prostration of our financial policy.

That is what the section contains. It is an invitation to the world to get gain by prostrating our financial policy, by gathering up the basis on which your banking system rests, and holding it for three, six, or twelve months as a means of gain, knowing that on the 1st of January, 1878, those notes can be converted into gold-bearing bonds, and that those gold-bearing bonds are worth par in all the markets of the world.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question? I regret to interrupt him, because I have been interested in hearing what he is saying; but I want to put this question: Whether or not the same influences will not be at work if the greenbacks are redeemable in coin on the 1st day of January, 1878, instead of in bonds?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly; but I have never advocated naming any particular day when the greenback should be retired in coin.

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to suggest to the Senator that his argument proves that to come to specie payments at any time and under any circumstances would be utterly ruinous. He has overturned his own position.

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir; it does not prove anything of the sort.

Mr. MORTON. I think it does clearly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. We went on from June, 1869, when gold was at 40 per cent. premium, and we reduced it from 12 to 14 per cent. by gradual and certain processes, by the improvement of the credit of the country, by restricting the volume of paper money, by developing the resources and industries and business of the country. If you will pursue that policy you can go on until coin and paper will become the equivalent of each other, and there will never be a moment when a man can say that he may make money by hoarding greenbacks, for he can never say when the greenback will be equal to coin.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, then, how comes it that from the 1st of April, 1870, to this hour the value of greenbacks has not appreciated a single cent?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will tell the Senator from Ohio. There are three reasons for it, for one of which the Congress of the United States is responsible; the other two were due to circumstances beyond the control of the country. On the 15th of April, 1870, the Franco-Prussian war opened. It made a great demand on England and consequently upon this country, for coin. It withdrew coin from the country, and its tendency naturally was to widen the difference between coin and paper, and therefore during that year we were unable to make progress in the right direction for there were unnatural and unexpected causes operating by which coin was drawn from the country.

The second great fact was that when the treaty of Paris was made and France agreed to pay five milliard francs, or $1,000,000,000, in coin as indemnity, the means of doing that were drawn largely from England. The deposits of one sort and another in this country, debts due from this country to England, were drawn upon, and we were obliged to contribute to the means by which France paid the indemnity that Germany exacted.

Then there was another consequent reason. Germany, stimulated by the fact that she had obtained large quantities of coin from France, resolved to demonetize silver and substitute gold in its place, and the consequence was that, to the extent of about $150,000,000, gold was substituted for silver in Germany.

All these causes operating together kept the quantity of coin in this country at a low point, drew from us the products of the mines, and during that period and even up to this time we have not recovered from the effects of the Franco-Prussian war.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one other question I should like to ask.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But I have not answered this yet. The other circumstance was this: under the revenue system which existed in 1870, and previous thereto, when the receipts of the Treasury were largely in excess of the expenditures, the Secretary of the Treasury was able to accumulate during the summer months a large surplus of paper money in the Treasury, and use it in the autumn in the purchase of bonds for the relief of the business of the country, affording facilities for the transportation of the crops from the West to the East, so that during one season the accumulation, without notice to the country, except through the monthly reports, reached the enormous sum of thirty-eight and a half million dollars. This sum of money so accumulated in the Treasury was, with reference to the volume of currency in circulation, precisely as though the volume of currency in the country had been reduced; it was withdrawn from active business; it was piled up and hoarded in the Treasury; it was a resisting power against the spirit of speculation in the city of New York. But when Congress, against the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, reduced the revenues of the country, and compelled the Government to manage its business with the slightest surplus, that power departed, and when that power departed the accumulation which had formerly rested in the Treasury during the summer months passed to Wall street, in the city of New York. The panic of last September was more clearly due to those facts, all having their origin in the policy of Congress by which the revenues of the country were reduced than to any and all other circumstances combined.

Mr. SHERMAN. The other question I wish to ask the Senator is this: whether or not the rapid fall of gold from the passage of the act of March 18, 1869, up and prior to the 1st of April, 1870, amounting to some twenty-odd per cent., created any real stringency or trouble in the country? Did the rapid appreciation of greenbacks, nearly 20 per cent. in one year, have that effect?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am not aware that it did.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then, if in one year the rapid appreciation of greenbacks 20 per cent. in market value did not create any perceptible trouble, but the people adapted themselves to the changed value of gold and paper, I ask the Senator whether in his judgment the appreciation of paper money from eighty-nine cents to one dollar will really in the course of four years create any stringency or hard times?

Mr. BOUTWELL. If you could distribute it over the four years, probably not; but what I assert in reference to this measure is that it not only does not distribute the difference between coin and paper over four years, but by the increase of banking facilities and the increase of the volume of paper your whole policy tends to widen that difference, so that when you reach 1877, instead of these being a margin of 11 per cent., it is more likely that the margin will be twice as great, and then you propose to jump that margin in a given period of time regardless of the consequences to the business of the country. This is a process which is fraught with disaster. If to-day you do not dare to assume the responsibility of mastering this difficulty by next January or by the January after, how can you assume that when the difference is greater than it is to-day you will have the courage or the capacity to overcome the difficulty three years hence?

Mr. SHERMAN. One more question I wish to ask the Senator; and that is whether he does not believe that sagacious business men, capitalists who invest their money in banks, will take the condition of the law and base their calculations upon it rather than the mere amount of paper money afloat? When they take the established fact, which he admits to be an established fact, that four years or three and a half years hence the United States will stand by this pledge, will not business men adapt their business to it?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not accept that "established fact;" I do not consider it so. I have not the least idea that the country will stand by this bill. I think when you pass this bill, you stir up elements of discord in every part of the country. Instead of its being a measure of conciliation, it is a measure fraught with discord. Is there any demand in the country for this particular measure?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Before the Senator passes from that I should like to put a question to him. The Senator stated, as one of the strong influences which had contributed to prevent the approach of greenbacks to coin, the fact that Congress had by the reduction of the tariff lessened the duties and thus prevented by a lessening of the revenues the possibility of that approach. Now, I wish to put to the Senator a question, and I ask him to answer it, as he will, frankly, why prior to the panic, when we were under a condition of prosperity under that same reduced tariff, every month revealed the fact that the public indebtedness was being lessened by the application of the surplus revenue toward the liquidation of the public debt?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Of course.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If that were the fact, and gold was gradually running down until it reached the point of 9 per cent. premium, lower than it has been since the panic, I ask why that should be a circumstance in the argument of the Senator to fortify himself when the question is put to him why the country does not resume at this time or next year?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Senator must know very well that the full effects of the reduction of taxes were not immediately felt, and that for some time after the passage of the bill the revenues were sufficient to more than meet the ordinary expenses, and furnished something every month for the reduction of the public debt; but from the 1st of July last to the present moment the total reduction of the public debt is less than $4,000,000. During the last summer there was very little decrease made.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator will remember that each month up to the panic there was a gradual reduction of the public debt. Since the panic there has been a very little reduction. Each month I think without exception prior to the panic showed a reduction until the aggregate amount during President Grant's administration approached nearly $400,000,000 in liquidation of the debt.

Mr. BOUTWELL. For the purposes of the argument which the question of my friend from Michigan contains, he has confounded events and times that are quite distinct. Up to the 4th of March, 1873, the decrease of the public debt had been very large, and during each preceding summer of General Grant's administration the Secretary of the Treasury was able to accumulate large balances; but during the last summer he was not, in consequence of the reduction of the revenue, and to that fact the panic in a large degree was due.

But I wish now to call the attention of the Senate and especially of the honorable chairman of the committee to the eighth section in another aspect. The proviso is that "the Secretary of the Treasury in lieu of such funds may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States." The first provision, however, is that on and after the 1st day of January, 1878, the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue 4, 4½, and 5 per cent. bonds for such greenbacks or United States notes as may be presented. Then—

The Secretary of the Treasury in lieu of such bonds may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue the United States notes so received either in exchange for coin at par, or, with the consent of the holder, in the redemption of bonds then redeemable at par, or in the purchase of bonds at not less than par, or to meet the current payments for the public service; and when used to meet current payments an equal amount of the gold in the Treasury shall be applied in redemption of the bonds known as five-twenty bonds.

Then the ninth section says this shall not be construed to authorize an increase of the principal of the public debt. The effect of this measure considered altogether is this: "The Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue the United States notes so received either in exchange for coin at par"—I assume that to be impossible—"or with the consent of the holder in the redemption of bonds then redeemable at par." The bonds that will be redeemable at par at that time will be 6 per cent. five-twenty bonds and no others. If a 5 per cent. bond is made, as it will be made by this eighth section, the equivalent in value of coin, is it possible that anybody will surrender a 6 per cent. bond for United States notes?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator now whether that very thing has not been done?

Mr. BOUTWELL. It has been done undoubtedly in some cases.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is, 6 per cent. bonds have been under the operation of the funding act surrendered for 5 per cent. bonds.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Not surrendered. The credit of the country was in the first place carried up to the point when we could sell a 5 per cent. bond at par in coin, and having made that sale we then took the coin and gave notice to the holders of 6 per cent. bonds that they must present them and exchange them and stop the interest, so that they became valueless as an investment. The bonds were due.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts to ask him to give way——

Mr. BOUTWELL. No; I will close in five minutes.

Mr. CAMERON. I want an executive session. There is a great deal of executive business to be done.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In a few cases this has been true, where there were registered bonds, and in some instances of a peculiar sort of coupon bonds, but generally registered bonds, where for some reason that was peculiar to those bonds they were not merchantable, they have been returned voluntarily to the Treasury, but the amount of these is so small that they are not worth consideration in a question of public policy. You cannot find persons when a 5 per cent. bond is made worth par in coin who will voluntarily surrender a 6 per cent. bond, principal and interest payable in coin, and take United States notes, which at best are only convertible into a 5 per cent. bond.

Mr. SHERMAN. As this is an interesting point and the Senator has had experience, I will ask him whether with $20,000,000 of gold in the Treasury—and there are now $50,000,000 of surplus revenue—in case the notes were flowing into the Treasury for bonds and the bonds were issued, there would be any difficulty in the Secretary of the Treasury paying with the gold on hand the 6 per cent. bonds, calling them in by numbers and names, just as the honorable Senator did when Secretary, and supplying the deficit in the revenue by the greenbacks thus received for the bonds, and whether that is not the refunding act carried out?

Mr. BOUTWELL. To some extent he might undoubtedly do that, but when you come to deal with the whole volume of United States notes that is an impossible thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then my friend from Massachusetts comes to the fallacy of my friend from Nevada, that the Secretary of the Treasury is not compelled to use these notes except for certain purposes. The law expressly provides that these notes shall be paid out for such and such purposes, and when they are paid out for current expenses, then the gold which is relieved from the ordinary uses of the Treasury is to be used to pay an equal amount of 6 per cent. bonds.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But you cannot call in the 6 per cent. bonds under three months.

Mr. SHERMAN. We shall have plenty of time to repeal that provision of the law in four years. The Secretary of the Treasury can count upon the amount of his revenue accruing month by month, and he could make a call three months ahead if it be necessary to give three months' notice.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But the Senator from Ohio does not pretend that the surplus gold would be sufficient to meet such a demand as would be made on the Treasury for 5 per cent. bonds under this system if there should be any margin between the value of bonds and the value of paper.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all; because this very act when it takes effect will leave no margin between the paper and bonds, because you can convert the paper into bonds. You might as well say that a bank which only had a reserve of one-tenth of its circulating notes was certain to be broken because you might suppose all the notes would come in together.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Then the Senator from Ohio does not admit that if you go on increasing the volume of paper money the difference between paper and coin, other things remaining the same, will widen.

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon the question of how much paper money will be issued under this act, I leave the Senator himself to state his own fair impression; I will not stop to discuss that. Whether this bill will largely increase the paper money, I will not discuss now.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The hour is late. I suppose that the purpose of the committee is that this question shall be ended to-night, though I do not know about that. I have said in substance what I desired to say and I have said it chiefly for the purpose of putting myself upon the record against this measure, a measure which I sincerely believe is fraught with greater evils to this country than any that has ever been presented to the Senate with a prospect of being adopted and made the law of the land.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the question on that motion, the Chair will ask the indulgence of the Senate to present the House bills on his table for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3672) authorizing the board of commissioners of the Soldiers' Home to sell the property belonging to the Soldiers' Home situated at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, and known as Harrodsburgh Springs property, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 3517) supplementary to the third section of the act entitled "An act to divide the State of Virginia into two judicial districts" was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following bills, prepared in the form prescribed by the two Houses; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873;

A bill (H. R. No. 2879) revising and embodying all the laws authorizing post-roads and in force on the 1st day of December, 1873; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3349) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States, general and permanent in their nature, relating to the District of Columbia, in force on the 1st day of December, in the year of our Lord 1873.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill, and I do it at this time for the purpose of having it printed. I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to consider it to-morrow in the morning hour, as it is very important that it should be disposed of.

The bill (S. No. 925) to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes, was read, and passed to a second reading.

GENEVA AWARD.

On motion of Mr. THURMAN, the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 7) for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain, were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at six o'clock and eight minutes p. m.) adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 11, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, obtained the floor.

PROPERTY OF SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have passed a bill authorizing the board of commissioners of the Soldiers' Home to sell the property belonging to the Soldiers' Home, situated at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, and known as the Harrodsburgh Springs property.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it will not occasion debate I will make no objection.

The bill was read for information.

The first section authorizes the board of commissioners of the Soldiers' Home to sell to the board of trustees of the Widows' Home and Orphans' University of the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows the property belonging to the Soldiers' Home situated at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, upon such terms as may be prescribed by the sanction of the Secretary of War.

The second section provides that after the said property shall have been sold and the purchase-money paid to the said board of commissioners they shall have full power to convey the said property to said purchasers, the board of trustees of the Widows' Home and Orphans' University of the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows by and for and in behalf of the United States, and that when the said deed shall have been properly acknowledged the United States shall be divested of title to said property, and the trustees of the Widows' Home and Orphans' University of the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows shall be invested with full title to the property.

No objection being made, the bill (H. R. No. 3672) was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3517) reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, being a bill supplementary to the third section of the act entitled "An act to divide the State of Virginia into two judicial districts."

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I must object to yielding for that purpose.

Mr. HUNTON. I hope my colleague will not object.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Gentlemen who object to the passage of that bill are not in their seats.

Mr. HUNTON. They have withdrawn their objection. I saw Mr. STOWELL, and also the gentleman who made the objection on the subject.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Very well; I withdraw my objection.

The bill was read.

The first section provides that the following provisions shall be added to the third section aforesaid:

The judge of the district court for the eastern district of Virginia shall be, and he is, authorized to appoint a clerk of the district court to be held in Alexandria, whose duties shall be governed by the laws now in force, and whose office shall be kept in Alexandria, in such room or rooms as the said judge shall designate in the building now used as custom-house, post-office, and court-room; and that the clerk so appointed shall perform the duties of clerk of both circuit and district court, to be held in Alexandria, as provided by said third section, and shall be entitled to all fees and emoluments appertaining to said office.

The second section provides that the clerk appointed as aforesaid shall keep the records and files of all cases thereinafter brought within the subdivision thereinafter named, and certify the same in manner already provided for by law; and that the subdivision referred to, over which the said courts shall have jurisdiction, shall contain the following counties of Virginia, namely: Culpeper, Fauquier, Prince William, Fairfax, Loudoun, and Alexandria; and that all process upon parties or in rem, residing or being in said counties, shall be made returnable to the said courts held in Alexandria, or the clerk's office, in manner and form now provided for.

The third section provides that all acts or parts of acts which are not consistent with the act are hereby repealed; and the act shall be in force from its passage.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table, with a view to dispose of matters that do not give rise to debate.

Mr. RANDALL. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. DAWES. I mean that if any matter comes up to which any gentleman objects it shall remain upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is merely to dispose of matters on the Speaker's table to which unanimous consent is given.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am willing to yield to allow that to be done for a little while, reserving the right to interrupt that business at any time.

TESTIMONY ORDERED TO BE PRINTED.

Mr. SENER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I ask unanimous consent that the testimony reported by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, which has not already been printed, be printed for the use of the Attorney-General's Department.

There was no objection; and the order to print was made.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DONNAN. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief personal explanation.

Mr. GARFIELD. How long?

Mr. DONNAN. Not more than five minutes.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted.

Mr. DONNAN. I was not present at the session for debate only that took place on the evening before last, and consequently I did not hear the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STORM,] a very small portion of which, I am informed, was actually delivered, about the Government Printing Office. I ask that the paragraph I have marked in that speech be read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Learning that such abuses did exist, early in the session I introduced a resolution on the subject, and had it referred to the Committee on Printing, of which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DONNAN] is chairman. Before this committee the Congressional Printer, Mr. Clapp, was requested to appear; this he declined to do, on the grounds, as I have been informed, that he was an officer of the Senate, and was responsible to that body alone. Owing to this refusal to appear and testify before the House Committee on Printing my resolution failed, and the committee reported a joint resolution, and have in pursuance of that resolution taken some testimony, and have just made report to this House. I have refrained from speaking upon this subject until that report was made. The day of adjournment not being far off, I feel it to be my duty to call the attention of the House to the subject now, so that it can, should it see fit, correct existing abuses by proper and necessary legislation.

Mr. DONNAN. In relation to these statements, I should rather say misstatements, I desire to say first, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has not during this entire session introduced and had referred to the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman any resolution under which we could summon the Congressional Printer before us to give testimony. Second, the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not seem to be aware of his action. He introduced a resolution which I hold in my hand, and which was of itself a concurrent resolution. Instead of that resolution failing before the committee as he alleges, the committee reported favorably upon it and promptly, simply enlarging its scope so as to authorize the committee to send for persons and papers. That resolution so enlarged they reported to the House and the House passed it, and it was sent to the Senate. Third, the House Committee on Printing has not had any resolution referred to them upon motion of any member under which they could summon the Congressional Printer to appear in relation to abuses in the Congressional Printing Office. Fourth, the subject which was examined by that Committee on Printing was under a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] relating solely to the comparative cost of printing the debates of Congress at the Government Printing Office and in the Globe office. The committee have restricted their examination to that subject and have reported upon that subject and upon that only. Fifth, the Congressional Printer has not refused at all, when summoned, to appear before the Committee on Printing, nor has he alleged to that committee that he is responsible solely to the Senate.

I deem it proper and prudent to say further that in the next paragraph of the gentleman's speech he makes what I was about to term an indecent allegation against the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing on the part of the Senate. He says:

It is clear that the chairman of that committee in the Senate either cannot or will not see anything wrong in the present Public Printer, or the system under which he is acting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to prevent the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DONNAN] making any explanation he may deem proper; but he must inform him that it was grossly unparliamentary to allude to the chairman of the Senate committee.

Mr. DONNAN. I deemed it proper to refer to the charge in order to repel it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was entirely out of order in doing so.

Mr. DONNAN. I simply wish to add that I presume these misstatements have arisen more on account of ignorance than in any intention on the part of the usually courteous gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is alleged in one of the morning papers that he is a member of the Committee on Printing. That is not the fact. Had he been a member of the Committee on Printing, I feel assured that he would not have allowed himself to be drawn into such gross misstatement of fact.

Mr. STORM. I ask consent to have a moment to reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DONNAN.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the time allowed the gentleman be limited.

Mr. RANDALL. Let him have the same length of time as was occupied by the gentleman from Iowa.

No objection was made.

Mr. STORM. I am not responsible for what any city newspaper may call me. The fact that a city paper says that I am a member of the Committee on Printing is a mistake of the paper, not of mine; I have never said so.

I will say this, that whatever mistakes there may be in my remarks in regard to the refusal of the Congressional Printer to appear before the Committee on Printing, I have been led into those mistakes by what the chairman of the Committee on Printing himself told me. All I know about the refusal of the Public Printer to appear before that committee I gathered from the gentleman from Iowa himself. He said to me that he could not get the Congressional Printer before the committee under my resolution; that he would be compelled to report the resolution in another form before he could do so.

Mr. DONNAN. For the simple reason that it was a concurrent resolution. The gentleman must have misunderstood me if he understood me as giving any other reason.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman said so himself.

Mr. DONNAN. I said that the House Committee had no authority to summon him under a concurrent resolution.

Mr. STORM. All I have said about the subject has been from information which I have gathered from the gentleman from Iowa himself. If he has changed his base since he gave me that information, it is not my fault.

Mr. DONNAN. I have not changed one particle. I said it was simply for the reason that we could not summon him before us on a concurrent resolution adopted only by the House; it must be adopted by both Houses.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The House has directed that business on the table shall be gone through with seriatim——

Mr. RANDALL. I did not understand that that was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Did not the gentleman understand that business to which there was no objection should be taken up?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I did not understand even that.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There is objection to the arrangement unless the civil-rights bill is excluded.

The SPEAKER. The proposition was to take up the bills seriatim, and that only those should be disposed of to which there was no objection.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then I make no objection to the arrangement.

Mr. DAWES. That was the proposition.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I simply wanted that understood.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I wish it understood that after this business is disposed of I shall be recognized for the business on which I am now on the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I give notice that as soon as we dispose of this business I shall insist on proceeding with the sundry civil appropriation bill.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SYSTEM.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3073) to amend section 19 of the act approved August 18, 1856, entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States."

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after "that," in line 1, down to and including "agent," in line 7, and insert "no embassador, envoy extraordinary, minister plenipotentiary, minister resident, commissioner to any foreign country, chargé d'affaires, secretary of legation, assistant secretary of legation, interpreter to any legation in any foreign country, consul-general, consul, commercial agent, consular pupil, or consular agent, shall."

Mr. RANDALL. I rise for the purpose of asking a question. If I understand this amendment it involves an additional outlay from the Treasury.

Mr. BANNING. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. RANDALL. In such a case would a point of order——

The SPEAKER. There is no necessity of raising any point of order, because a single objection leaves the bill where it is. No bill can be acted on without unanimous consent. That ought to be plain enough. Is there objection?

Mr. SENER. Unless this bill can be read I will object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill will be returned to the Speaker's table.

COMMISSION OF ARMY OFFICERS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3166) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Army.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Strike out the preamble, in these words:

Whereas a vacancy of major in the Quartermaster's Department existed on the 18th day of January, 1867, to which Captain William Myers, of the Quartermaster's Department, was entitled to be promoted under the laws then in existence, but from which he was excluded by reason of an appointment in said department erroneously made: Therefore,

At the end of the bill add as a new section——

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

GEORGE M. BOOK.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2208) authorizing the President to reinstate George M. Book on the active list of the Navy.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out all after "provided," in line 4, and insert:

That he shall first be ordered to, and perform, actual sea duty on some cruising vessel of war for the period of one year; and if at the expiration of such period of duty he shall be pronounced by proper naval authority to be no longer incapacitated for active service in any respect: And provided further, That he shall not receive any extra pay for the time he was on the retired list, and not on active duty prior to his restoration under this act.

There being no objection, the amendment was concurred in.

ANN CRANE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 280) granting a pension to Ann Crane.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out "fifteen" and insert "eight."

There being no objection, the amendment was concurred in.

B. W. HARRIS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 1045) for the relief of B. W. Harris, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Massachusetts.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

After the word "sums" insert "not to exceed $346.53."

There being no objection, the amendment was concurred in.

CENTENNIAL MEDALS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 1753) to authorize medals commemorating the one-hundredth anniversary of the first meeting of the Continental Congress, and of the Declaration of Independence.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That medals, with appropriate devices, emblems, and inscriptions, commemorative of the centennial anniversary of the Declaration of Independence be prepared at the Mint at Philadelphia for the centennial board of finance, subject to the provisions of the fifty-second section of the coinage act of 1873, upon the payment of a sum not less than the cost thereof; and all provisions, whether penal or otherwise, of said coinage act against counterfeiting or imitating of coins of the United States shall apply to medals struck and issued under the provisions of this act.

There being no objection, the amendment was concurred in.

PROCEEDINGS IN MANDAMUS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 1273) to regulate proceedings in mandamus, which was returned from the Senate with amendments.

The amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. Shall these amendments of the Senate be concurred in?

Mr. ASHE. I object to that bill.

WIGHT STREET, DETROIT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 1706) to authorize the opening of Wight street through the grounds of the United States marine hospital at Detroit, Michigan, returned from the Senate with the following amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to cause Wight street, in the city of Detroit, Michigan, to be increased in width fifty feet in that portion of said street adjacent to the marine-hospital grounds of said city: Provided, That George Jerome, John Owen, and C. H. Buhl, of said city, shall be appointed appraisers to ascertain and report to the Secretary of the Treasury the damages resulting to the United States by using a strip of land from the marine-hospital grounds aforesaid for that purpose, and that the Detroit Transit Railway Company of said city shall pay into the Treasury of the United States the amount of damages ascertained and reported as herein provided.

Amend the title so as to read:
A bill to authorize the widening of Wight street through the grounds of the United States marine hospital at Detroit, Michigan.

There being no objection, the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

ENGRAVING FOR PROFESSOR BAIRD'S REPORT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the following concurrent resolution of the Senate:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That Spencer F. Baird, United States commissioner of fish and fisheries, be authorized to have the engraving for his report executed under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

The SPEAKER. That concurrent resolution, under the law, will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a concurrent resolution from the Senate that the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are thereby, instructed to adjourn their respective Houses sine die at twelve o'clock noon, Monday, June 22, 1874.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it in order to refer that concurrent resolution?

Mr. KASSON. I object to it.

The SPEAKER. It will then go back to the Speaker's table.

SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER. House bills with Senate amendments having been disposed of, the Chair, under the order of the House, will now call up the Senate bills on the Speaker's table for reference by unanimous consent, as well as to be otherwise disposed of.

RAILROADS IN THE TERRITORIES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States, and granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands.

Mr. McCRARY. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. That is an objection of itself, and the bill will remain on the Speaker's table.

SAINT PAUL AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 486) to extend the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act for the extension of time to the Saint Paul and Pacific Railway Company for the completion of its road."

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

ABSALOM BAIRD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 529) to authorize an appointment in the Inspector-General's Department; which was read a first and second time.

The bill and preamble were read. The preamble recites a vacancy of lieutenant-colonel in the Inspector-General's Department of the Army originated on the 13th of June, 1867, to which Major Absalom Baird was entitled to be promoted under the laws then in existence, but from which he was excluded by reason of another appointment in said department previously made; and that an act of Congress approved June 8, 1872, was passed with the intention of rectifying this wrong, but has failed to secure to Major Baird his just rights. The bill authorizes the President to nominate and promote Absalom Baird to be lieutenant-colonel and assistant inspector-general, to date from June 13, 1867; but no pay or allowance shall be made to him for any time prior to the passage of the act.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BISHOP & CO.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 272) for the relief of Bishop & Co., bankers, of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands; which was read a first and second time.

On motion of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, the bill was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PHILIP S. WALES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 745) for the relief of Philip S. Wales, medical inspector in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The Committee on Naval Affairs rejected that bill, and I move that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. COX. I object to the action.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I move that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A SCHOONER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 793) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of schooner Jennie Spencer to that of Santa Rosa.

There being no objection, the bill was read three times, and passed.

LOUISA H. HASELL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 91) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa H. Hasell.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let that bill go to a committee.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

CAROLINE M. PURVIANCE AND FRANCIS WYETH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 644) for the relief of Caroline M. Purviance and Francis Wyeth.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let that bill also be referred.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ROBERT M. AND STEPHEN A. DOUGLASS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 660) referring the petition and papers in the case of Robert M. and Stephen A. Douglass, in so far as the same relate to cotton seized, to the Court of Claims.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let the bill be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. KELLOGG. I object to the reference. I do not object to the bill being considered now.

The bill remained on the Speaker's table.

GERMAN EVANGELICAL CHURCH AT MARTINSBURGH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 709) for the relief of the trustees of the German Evangelical church, of Martinsburgh, West Virginia.

The bill was read.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let the bill be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. HAGANS. I object to the reference.

The bill remained on the Speaker's table.

SAMUEL S. POTTER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 786) for the relief of Samuel S. Potter.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let that bill be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

COMPULSORY PILOT-FEES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 675) to relieve ships and vessels from compulsory pilot-fees in certain cases.

Mr. RAINEY. I object.

The bill remained on the Speaker's table.

ALEXANDER HENDERSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 828) for the relief of Alexander Henderson.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let that bill be referred.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 218) to enable the Secretary of the Interior to make final settlement with the Pottawatomie Indians of Michigan and Indiana under treaty stipulations existing with them.

Mr. RAINEY. Let that bill go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PACKARD. I object to the reference.

The bill remained on the Speaker's table.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope gentlemen will not object to that bill being considered as read three times and passed.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, is not that bill considered as passed?

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman is very anxious about it. He will have to wait a little.

The bill remained on the Speaker's table.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 732) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes."

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think that the bill had better be referred.

Mr. SAWYER. Then let it go to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

RELIEF OF CONTRACTORS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 141) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let that bill go to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. KELLOGG. I object to the reference.

The bill remained on the Speaker's table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the President pro tempore had appointed Mr. PRATT a member of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of Benjamin W. Reynolds, in place of Mr. ALCORN, excused.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 3171) to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties.

MOIETIES UNDER CUSTOMS LAWS.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I ask that the bill in relation to moieties just returned from the Senate with amendments be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and printed.

Mr. WOOD. I suggest to the gentleman that he add "with leave to report at any time."

The SPEAKER. That leave attaches to the bill. Leave was granted to the committee to report at any time, and that leave holds until the final disposition of the bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. MYERS. I would inquire what was done with the bill in relation to the Texas Pacific Railroad?

The SPEAKER. It was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. MYERS. I should have objected to it, but on account of the confusion which prevailed in the Hall I did not hear what was going on.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I should have objected also.

Mr. SYPHER. There were two motions made for its reference, and if the gentleman had desired to object he could have done so.

Mr. RANDALL. It makes no difference practically.

The SPEAKER. That is true; the bill can only be reached by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. RANDALL. In either event.

SAINT CROIX AND BAYFIELD RAILROAD COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 654) to extend the time for the completion of a railroad from the Saint Croix River or Lake between townships 25 and 31, to the west end of Lake Superior, and to Bayfield, in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. SPEER. I object to that bill.

Mr. SAWYER. I think there can be no objection to it.

Objection being made, the bill remained on the Speaker's table.

JAMES S. DAY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 277) making an appropriation for the payment of $792.46, due the late James L. Day, of Connecticut, for transporting the mails over post-route No. 8151.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think that bill should be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I object to its reference.

Objection being made, the bill remained on the Speaker's table.

EDMUND M. RANDOLPH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 443) to provide for the payment of legal services rendered by Edmund M. Randolph to the United States.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think that bill should go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LUTTRELL. This bill has passed the Senate and has been before the Committee on the Judiciary of this House, and I hope the House will pass it. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] can explain the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The bill has been passed by our committee once.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Not this bill?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes; the same bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Then I withdraw my objection.

The bill was read.

Mr. RAINEY. I object to the bill.

Objection being made, the bill remained on the Speaker's table.

HAZING AT THE NAVAL ACADEMY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 849) to prevent hazing at the Naval Academy.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that bill.

Mr. ARCHER. The Committee on Naval Affairs are unanimously in favor of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it vests too much power in the Superintendent.

Objection being made, the bill remained on the Speaker's table.

PUBLIC PARK AT MACKINAC.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 28) to set apart a certain portion of the island of Mackinac, in the Straits of Mackinac, within the State of Michigan, as a national park.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I object to that bill.

Objection being made, the bill remained on the Speaker's table.

NATHANIEL M'KAY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that bill should take the same course that bill No. 141 took as the numbers are so near, and I object to its consideration.

Objection being made, the bill remained on the Speaker's table.

LANDS NEAR NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 313) to confirm the purchase by the executive department of three acres of land, more or less, in the vicinity of Nashville, Tennessee, known as the site of Fort Houston, and to donate and convey the same to the Fisk University for educational purposes.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That bill should be referred to some committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I object to its consideration.

Objection being made, the bill remained on the Speaker's table.

AMERICAN FORK RAILWAY COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 332) granting to the American Fork Railway Company a right of way through the public lands for the construction of a railroad and telegraph.

Mr. ORR objected to the bill, and it remained on the Speaker's table.

SIERRA IRON COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 514) granting to the Sierra Iron Company a right of way through the public lands for a railroad and telegraph.

Mr. RAINEY objected to the bill, and it remained on the Speaker's table.

LANDS GRANTED TO THE STATE OF OREGON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 624) to authorize the issuance of patents for lands granted to the State of Oregon in certain cases; which was taken up and read a first and second time.

The preamble states that certain lands have heretofore, by acts of Congress, been granted to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of certain military wagon-roads in said State, and there exists no law providing for the issuing of formal patents for said lands. The bill provides that in all cases where the roads in aid of the construction of which said lands were granted are shown by the certificate of the governor of the State of Oregon, as in said acts provided, to have been constructed and completed, patents for said lands shall issue in due form to the State of Oregon as fast as the same shall, under said grants, be selected and certified, unless the State of Oregon shall by public act have transferred its interests in said lands to any corporation or corporations, in which case the patents shall issue from the General Land Office to such corporation or corporations upon their payment of the necessary expenses thereof; provided that this act shall not be construed to revive any land grant already expired, nor to create any new rights of any kind, except to provide for issuing patents for land to which the State is already entitled.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think that ought to go to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Committee on the Public Lands have examined this bill. It provides for nothing but issuing patents for lands which have already been granted.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

URIAH W. BRIGGS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a bill (S. No. 533) granting a pension to Uriah W. Briggs.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Uriah W. Briggs, of Gorham, New Hampshire, late captain of Company F, Seventeenth Maine Volunteers.

No objection was made, and the bill was read three times, and passed.

HANNAH W. SUMNER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a bill (S. No. 615) to increase the pension of Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner, who died March 21, 1863, while in command of the Department of the West.

Mr. RUSK. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

No objection was made; and the bill was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MARTIN V. JACKSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a bill (S. No. 658) granting a pension to Martin V. Jackson.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Martin V. Jackson, late a first lieutenant in Captain N. J. Roscoe's Company, Second Regiment of Kansas State Militia.

No objection being made, the bill was read three times, and passed.

THOMAS SMITH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a bill (S. No. 690) granting a pension to Thomas Smith.

Mr. RUSK. Let that bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

No objection being made, the bill was accordingly read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

EXAMINATION OF BOUNTY-LAND WARRANTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a bill (S. No. 763) to exempt military bounty-land warrants and the lands obtained thereby from sale or execution, or by virtue of any order or decree of court.

Mr. BARBER objected to the bill, and it remained upon the table.

PENSION BILLS.

The following bills were taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. RUSK, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

A bill (S. No. 767) granting a pension to Andrew J. Lasley;

A bill (S. No. 768) granting a pension to John S. Long;

A bill (S. No. 814) granting a pension to Ebenezer W. Brady; and

A bill (S. No. 874) granting a pension to John Colahan.

PATENTS, TRADE-MARKS, AND COPYRIGHTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a bill (S. No. 876) to amend the law relating to patents, trade-marks, and copyrights.

The bill provides that no person shall maintain an action for the infringement of his copyright, unless he shall give notice thereof by inserting in the several copies of every edition published, on the title-page or the page immediately following, if it be a book; or if a map, chart, musical composition, print, cut, engraving, photograph, painting, drawing, chromo, statue, statuary, or model or design intended to be perfected and completed as a work of fine arts, by inscribing upon some visible portion thereof, or of the substance on which the same shall be mounted, the following words, namely: "Entered according to the act of Congress, in the year ——, by A B, in the office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington;" or, at his option, the word "copyright," together with the year the copyright was entered, and the name of the party by whom it was taken out, thus, "copyright, 18—, by A B."

The second section provides that for recording and certifying any instrument of writing for the assignment of a copyright, the Librarian of Congress shall receive from the persons to whom the service is rendered, one dollar; and for every copy of an assignment, one dollar; said fee to cover in either case a certificate of the record, under seal of the Librarian of Congress; and all fees so received shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The third section provides that in the construction of this act the words engraving, cut, and print shall be applied only to pictorial illustrations of works connected with the fine arts; and no prints or labels designed to be used for any other articles of manufacture shall be entered under the copyright law, but may be registered in the Patent Office; and the Commissioner of Patents is hereby charged with the supervision and control of the entry or registry of such prints or labels, in conformity with the regulations provided by law as to copyrights of prints, except that there shall be paid for recording the title of any print or label not a trade-mark three dollars, which shall cover the expense of furnishing a copy of the record, under the seal of the Commissioner of Patents, to the party entering the same.

The fourth section repeals all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the foregoing provisions.

The fifth section provides that this act shall take effect on and after the 1st day of August, 1874.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents to ask that this bill be passed with an amendment which I will propose.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Can that be done?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WHEELER.). Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. FRYE. This bill has already been examined by the Joint Committee on the Library and also by the Committee on Patents, and they recommend its passage.

Mr. CONGER. The Committee on Patents propose to amend the bill by increasing the fee to be paid for recording the title of any print or label not a trade-mark from three to six dollars.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. I ask consent for that purpose, and that the bill, as amended, be then passed.

No objection was made, and the amendment was agreed to, and the bill, as amended, passed.

THOMAS HUGHES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 875) for the relief of Thomas Hughes.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think that bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let it remain where it is.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be returned to the Speaker's table.

DANIEL S. MERSHON, JR.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 134) for the relief of Daniel S. Mershon, jr.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That bill should go to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think it should be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be returned to the Speaker's table.

NAVAL MONUMENTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 711) providing for the completion and location of the naval monument.

The bill was read.

Mr. KILLINGER objected, and the bill remained on the Speaker's table.

JOHN W. TRUITT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 877) granting a pension to John W. Truitt; which was read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. RUSK, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

LIVANNA INGRAHAM.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 536) granting a pension to Livanna Ingraham; which was read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. RUSK, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

G. B. TYLER AND E. H. LUCKETT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 844) for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham; which was read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, referred to the Committee on Claims.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC, EASTERN BRANCH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 758) to authorize and provide for the construction of a substantial iron and masonry bridge and of a causeway across the Anacostia or Eastern Branch of the Potomac River, at or near the site of the present navy-yard bridge.

Mr. RAINEY objected, and the bill was returned to the Speaker's table.

JOHN M'HARG.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 452) for the relief of John McHarg, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth collection district of New York; which was read a first and sneond time, and, on motion of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, referred to the Committee on Claims.

JOHN T. SMITH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 448) for the relief of John T. Smith; which was read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MEDALS FOR OFFICERS OF THE UNITED STATES SHIP MONOCACY.

The next besiness on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 870) giving the assent of Congress to the acceptance by the officers of the United States ship Monocacy of silver medals presented to them by the King of Siam; which was read a first and second time.

The bill gives the consent of Congress to the acceptance by the officers of the United States ship Monocacy of the silver medals presented to them by the King of Siam on the occasion of the recent interchange of civilities between His Majesty and the officers of said ship representing the United States.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET E. ALEXANDER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 41) granting a pension to Margaret E. Alexander, widow of Edwin A. Alexander, deceased, late a private of Company K, Eighth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, known as the Thirty-ninth Indiana Regiment; which was read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

VAN R. MORGAN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 325) to remove the political disabilities of Van R. Morgan, of Virginia.

Mr. RAINEY objected, and the bill remained on the Speaker's table.

JOHN JULIUS GUTHERIE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 252) to remove the disabilities of John Julius Gutherie.

Mr. RAINEY objected, and the bill remained on the Speaker's table.

HAYTIAN BRIG MARGARETTA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 535) for the relief of the owners of the Haytian brig Margaretta or their legal representatives; which was read a first time, and, on motion of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, referred to the Committee on Claims.

UNITED STATES NAVY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 716) for the better government of the Navy of the United States; which was read a first time, and, on motion of Mr. ARCHER, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, SALT LAKE CITY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 677) to incorporate the First Presbyterian church of Salt Lake City, in the Territory of Utah; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope that this bill will be passed now.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Territories.

The bill was so referred.

AMENDMENT OF AN APPROPRIATION ACT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 460) to amend an act entitled "An act to make appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1872," approved March 3, 1871; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. KASSON. If the bill be read I think there will be no objection to passing it.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was so referred.

C. L. STEPHENSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 906) for the relief of C. L. Stephenson, of Virginia, of his political disabilities.

Mr. RAINEY objected, and the bill was returned to the Speaker's table.

DISTRICT COURTS IN LOUISIANA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 88) for the better organization of the district courts within the State of Louisiana.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This bill ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MOREY. I object to the reference.

The bill was returned to the Speaker's table.

ERRORS IN PRIZE-LISTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 907) authorizing correction to be made in errors in prize-lists; which was read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. ARCHER, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN WISCONSIN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 693) to change the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin at Oshkosh; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SAWYER. I hope that this bill will be passed now.

The first section of the bill provides that the time of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin, at Oshkosh, be on the second Tuesday of July of each year instead of the first Monday of July, as now provided by law; and that all recognizances, indictments, writs, process, and other proceedings, civil and criminal, now pending in either of said courts, may be entered, heard, and tried at the time fixed by the bill for holding such courts.

The second section provides that this act shall not interfere with the terms of such courts appointed to be holden at Milwaukee, in that district, nor with the power now possessed by the judges of such courts to order special terms of the same as now provided by law.

DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

Mr. SENER withdrew his objection to taking from the Speaker's table an amendment of the Senate to the bill (S. No. 3073) to amend section 19 of the act approved August 18, 1856, entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States."

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Amend so as to make the bill read as follows:

That no embassador, envoy extraordinary, minister plenipotentiary or minister resident, commissioner to any foreign country, chargé d'affaires, secretary of legation, assistant secretary of legation, interpreter to any legation in any foreign country, consular-general, consul, commercial agent, consular pupils, or consular agent shall be absent from his post or the performance of his duties for a longer period than ten days at any one time, without the permission previously obtained of the President. And no compensation shall be allowed for the time of any such absence in any case except in cases of sickness; nor shall any diplomatic or consular officer correspond in regard to the public affairs of any foreign government with any private person, newspaper, or other periodical, or otherwise than with the proper officers of the United States; nor, without the consent of the Secretary of State previously obtained, recommend any person at home or abroad for any employment of trust or profit under the government of the country in which he is located; nor ask or accept, for himself or any other person, any present, emolument, pecuniary favor, office, or title of any kind from any such government.

The amendment was concurred in.

NATHANIEL M'KAY.

Mr. RANDALL withdrew his objection to taking from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DAWES. That committee has already acted on the bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS HUGHES.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 875) for the relief of Thomas Hughes was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is entitled to the floor on a motion in reference to the business of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Not wishing to antagonize the business of the Committee on Appropriations, I have had a consultation with the chairman of that committee, and now move, with his concurrence, that there shall be a session on Monday evening next at seven and a half o'clock for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to be considered in the House to the exclusion of all other business.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let them be considered and discussed in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not know whether I can accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition that on Monday next at seven and a half o'clock there shall be a session for the consideration of business from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. What I wish is to have the bills considered in the House without being liable to points of order.

The SPEAKER. And that is the only way in which it can be done, that the bills shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, which will give five minutes, pro and con until the House orders the previous question.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. That is just what I want, and I move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and an evening session was ordered for Monday evening next for the business of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole to the exclusion of all other business.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported they had examined and found to be truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

WASHINGTON NATIONAL MONUMENT.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That it shall be in order to move an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole providing for an appropriation of $75,000 to aid in the completion of the Washington national monument by the one hundredth anniversary of American independence, with the proviso that the Washington Monumental Association be required to reconvey to the United States reservation No. 3 in the city of Washington, on which the monument now stands.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I object.

The question recurred on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WARD of Illinois, and Mr. ELDREDGE were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 106, noes 55.

So there was a second.

Mr. ELDREDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 148, nays 85, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Bass, Beck, Berry, Bland, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Curtis, Darrall, Duell, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Giddings, Glover, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Harmer, Benjamin W. Wilson, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—56.

So (two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

MONUMENT TO THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say that the Committee on the Washington Monument, to whom was referred the subject of completing the unfinished monument to the mother of Washington, have examined that question, and if this resolution had carried we would have asked that a very small appropriation should be made to finish that long-unfinished work. But taking the vote just given as an expression of the sense of the House I shall not now press that.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a bill agreed to unanimously by that committee with reference to ocean telegraphs.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I object.

Mr. COX. The gentleman objects before he knows what it is. I move so to suspend the rules that I may have leave to report this bill. It is the first time I have asked for a suspension of the rules this session. I am authorized by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which has had no show hitherto.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Chair in a conflict as to the order of business to give preference to public business so far as to submit to the House a motion for its consideration.

Mr. COX. This is a general public bill.

The SPEAKER. It is not technically public business.

Mr. COX. It is a bill to regulate the whole ocean telegraph business of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will see that the gentleman is recognized upon his bill. Meanwhile he must submit to the House the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. Pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, I move that when the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the bill the first reading be dispensed with, and that the committee shall proceed to consider the bill by paragraphs for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The motion was agreed to.

The question being taken on the motion that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the special order, the motion was agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House the first reading of the bill and all general debate thereon have been dispensed with.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations, as in other cases, have submitted a printed report in connection with this bill, giving all the documents and vouchers relating to it not found in the Book of Estimates. It is Report No. 636, and gentlemen can get it by sending to the document-room.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, and read the following:

Public printing and binding:

For the public printing, for the public binding, and for paper for the public printing, including the cost of printing the debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, $1,645,507.66; and out of the sum hereby appropriated, printing and binding may be done by the Congressional Printer to the amounts following, namely:

For the Court of Claims, $10,000; for the Department of State, $25,000; for the Treasury Department, $325,000; for the War Department, $100,000; for the Navy Department, $75,000; for the Interior Department, $225,000; for the Agricultural Department, $20,000; for the Department of Justice and the Attorney-General's office, $10,000; for the Supreme Court of the United States, $25,000; for the supreme court of the District of Columbia, $5,000; for the Post-Office Department, $175,000; and for both Houses of Congress, $650,507.66; and the amounts herein designated for the several Executive Departments may be distributed to the Bureaus thereof at the discretion of the head of each Department, who shall certify such distribution to the Public Printer; and wages paid to printers and binders in the employ of the Government shall not be above the average price paid for similar work in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore.

Mr. MYERS, and Mr. HAWLEY of Connecticut, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has the floor.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out from line 34 to line 37, as follows:

And wages paid to printers and binders in the employ of the Government shall not be above the average price paid for similar work in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to a question of order. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether that clause would not be subject to a point of order, inasmuch as it changes existing law?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. COBURN. I should like to have the law read before the point of order is decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the clause is simply a limitation on the appropriation. It is upon that ground that the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I move to strike out that clause, because I prefer to leave the settlement of this question to the Public Printer and the printers. I do not think it wise to attempt to bind the Public Printer by any fixed rules. If he is fit to hold his place he ought to be capable of employing these thousand men and of negotiating with them as to their proper wages. I think there is reason in the claim made by the printers, that they ought not to be confined to the average prices paid in the three cities named in this paragraph. I think so because, in the first place, it is more expensive to live here than in Baltimore and Philadelphia, and probably New York. In illustration of this, let me mention that there are printers who now work here in this city who pay $140 a year for a commutation ticket, making their homes in Baltimore, because they can pay for a commutation ticket and can live cheaper in Baltimore than in Washington.

Moreover you want to have a class of workmen above the average to do this work. There is a large portion of it which is difficult and requires very capable workmen; as for example, as any printer will know, in the work of the Coast Survey, the Nautical Almanac, (astronomical work,) the Observatory printing, the work of the Smithsonian, the Ordnance Department, the Land Office, the Signal Office, the geological and botanical work, the catalogues of the library. All this is very difficult printers' work. The men have to correct their own work, and ought to have a much higher price for it than the average wages in those cities. They earn it.

Every hour of lost time is deducted. Of course that is all well enough, and we find no fault with it; but I am trying to get at what their wages are as compared with those paid in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. In Philadelphia and Baltimore they get eighteen dollars a week, and in New York twenty-one dollars a week, and here twenty-four dollars a week. I think that is only a reasonable price. Here they work one-fifth less hours than they do in those cities, and their pay will consequently be one-fifth or 20 per cent. less; so that if you reduce their pay down to the average of these cities, it will amount to but $15.20 a week. But, Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to state this matter in five minutes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MYERS. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I have not talked five minutes; I have only talked three minutes. I have had my watch in my hand all the time; I commenced at fourteen minutes past one o'clock, and it is now just seventeen minutes past one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state his point of order.

Mr. MYERS. I rose to make the point of order before the gentleman from Connecticut got the floor, but was not recognized.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I claim the floor on the ground that my time has not expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the gentleman's five minutes had expired.

Mr. MYERS. If I do not lose the right to make the point of order, I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state his point of order.

Mr. MYERS. My point of order is that the lines which my friend from Connecticut moves to strike out change the existing law and are not in order, and I send the law to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. GARFIELD. The point of order comes too late even if it were well taken.

Mr. MYERS. I rose before the gentleman from Connecticut offered his amendment, and I ask that the law be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order comes too late. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has moved an amendment to strike out these lines and has spoken on that amendment. He thinks that he spoke only four minutes; but the Chair thinks he spoke five minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. No; I spoke only three minutes; there is no mistake about that.

Mr. MYERS. I do not waive my right to raise the point of order; but I want the law read.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Only a portion of my time had expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the gentleman's time had expired, and the gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield two minutes of my time to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Printers here who work by the hour get sixty cents per thousand ems, and they work at all hours in the night or day. Now the printers in New York who work on morning papers get fifty-five cents per thousand ems; but the printers here work more irregularly than in New York. The general body of the printers here work by the week at twenty-four dollars a week. If you paid them by the piece they would earn much more money. The work which is done so irregularly in this Public Printing Office upon the RECORD must be done by the piece. I say then that because the work done is of a higher class and requires a higher class of workmen, and because the expense of living is so much greater here, it is not just to pass this bill and arbitrarily cut down the pay of these men. Let the Public Printer make his bargain with them as he best can.

It is said that the printers' union here have dictated too high terms. Sir, the terms under which these men are working were made ten years ago, when the printers in the Government employ did not constitute a majority of the union and these terms were agreed upon then by a Government Printer, being a lower rate than the printers at that time demanded. The rate has not been changed by any arbitrary action of theirs within a short period as might be inferred.

Mr. GARFIELD. I simply desire the House to understand the merits of this question as well as I can state them in three minutes. There is a union here known as the printers' union, and another corresponding union known as the binders' union, and one of their rules is that they shall control the number of apprentices allowed to learn their trade, and after the limit fixed by them is reached no one in the United States can be permitted to learn that particular trade and any employer who employs a greater number of apprentices than they allow is thrown out of relations with the union. Thus they limit the number of persons who can be employed in their particular craft.

In the next place, it is a rule of the printer's union that any chapter of the union may fix the rates of wages, the rates of pay, within the city where the chapter is located. It so happens that in the city of Washington a majority of all the printers and binders belonging to the union are employed at the Government Printing Office. Therefore, when these employés of the Government vote for any particular figure or rate of pay, that governs not only the pay in the Government Printing Office where they are employed, but the pay for all the printing, public or private, done in this city.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. It takes a two-thirds vote to fix the rate of pay.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be so.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. And the present rate was fixed ten years ago.

Mr. GARFIELD. In 1864, when gold was 285, and when a dollar in paper here in Washington was worth just thirty-eight cents in gold, and when the prices of everything had reached their top figure, the rate of wages which the Government Printing Office is now paying was fixed. I would not, by any legislation or otherwise, deprive this very worthy class of citizens of all the pay which they ought to receive. I would not do anything that in the slighest degree would damage their business interests as laboring men. But is it fair to the whole class of persons who are compelled to employ this class of workingmen, and to have printing or binding done and pay for it—is it fair that the Government Printing Office should establish rates of pay or allow those rates to be established independent of its own will, and have those rates govern all the printing and binding done in this city outside of the Government printing establishment?

Furthermore, is it fair that the rate of pay in this city of Washington should be established at from 15 to 20 per cent. higher than it is in Baltimore, Philadelphia, or New York?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me a moment more. If it is thought that, for certain reasons, there ought to be a higher rate of pay given here than in those cities, then provide that the rate of pay shall be not more than so much in excess of the average in those cities. But, at any rate, let us, as one of the parties concerned, be consulted about the rate of pay which we shall give to these our employés.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The Government Printer has full power over that matter now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am somewhat surprised at this special legislation against a body of citizens. Whenever Congress goes to work to fix the rate of interest which bonds of the Government shall bear, those bonds having been bought at thirty-eight cents in gold on the dollar, and Congress by intervening legislation having raised the value of those bonds to 110—when Congress shall establish a lower rate of interest to be paid on these bonds, then I shall be more willing to fix the wages of the printers and the other laborers of the country at a lower rate than is now paid here. But when it is permitted to capitalists to come together and organize for the purpose of protecting their own capital, and they can come to Congress and obtain the passage of laws for that purpose, I for one can see no objection to the printers, and the binders, and the carpenters, and the shoemakers, and all the other different classes of workingmen, organizing together for their own protection against capital. And I was sorry to hear my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, say that this law meant that these men should not organize for their own protection.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; not at all. They have a perfect right to organize, and we have a perfect right for our own part to pay what wages we please.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, they have a perfect right to organize, and then we have a perfect right by congressional legislation to prevent their deriving any benefit from that organization.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then what is this legislation for?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is to prevent their getting higher wages than is paid to others of the same craft for the same work.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am willing that they should organize and get more pay if they can in the Government Printing Office. I am willing for several reasons; the first is this: they should have higher pay in Washington than anywhere else, because there is no other place in the country where these men have to pay so high rates of rent and board as in Washington. While perhaps a man can live here cheaper, leaving out the rent, than he can in some other cities, yet there is no place where the item of rent is so high as it is here.

Then there is another reason. It happens that almost two-thirds of all the printers and binders in Washington are in Government employ. They are but intermittently employed. If we vote the publication of a large number of books, then they are employed right on until those books are printed. If we decrease the number to be published, then their work is stopped. And when the work in the Government Printing Office is stopped, there is nobody else to employ them, and they must leave; they must pack up their household effects and go away to some other place to find work, or else wait here until they are called back to the Government Printing Office by some further order of Congress for the publication of documents. In fact Washington is only a winter watering place for these printers and binders. When Congress goes away in the summer nothing is done. All classes of artisans have to lie over from one session to another. And this is what makes rents so high during the session; we have to pay for six months what elsewhere would be the rent for a year. If Government work stops there is no redress for these men. In New York City, for instance, when work stops in one private establishment the printer can go to another, or a third, or a fourth, or a fifth; but there is substantially no business of this kind done here. When Government work stops here, the poor artisan must travel from city to city seeking work, or he must wait until the time for work comes around again. Therefore we ought to pay higher rates than are paid in other cities. For these reasons, I hope this provision will be struck out of the bill.

Mr. MYERS. As I understand, this provision has been put in the bill by the committee because certain outside parties in this city want to pay less to their employés than they are now paying. Now we have on the statute-book a law with which the provision reported in this bill conflicts. I wanted, therefore, to make a point of order upon the provision, but was prevented from doing so. I will, however, read the provision of existing law:

> It shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to contract with persons in that employment at such prices as are for the interest of the Government and just to those employed.

The printers' union fixes four dollars a day as the price to be paid in this city. It is a little higher than the prices paid in other cities where, it is true, living is not so high. But does the Government lose anything by it? No, sir. The printers are allowed sixty cents per thousand ems; the work is measured off; and whether they work eight hours a day, or more, or less, they receive at the end of the month their pay for the work they have done.

Now, this is really not an attempt to benefit the Government, but an effort of outside printers who wish to pay their employés less than they are now paying them. The price fixed by the union in this city is four dollars a day, because the cost of living is higher here than in other cities. It would be unjust and contrary to the spirit of the law to attempt to make Congress the medium for legislating as to the price to be paid by private employers. If you reduce the price to three dollars a day you will get just three dollars' worth of work, measured by the thousand ems. That is a clear statement of the case; and it is the whole case.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DONNAN. I renew the amendment. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] insists that this provision should be stricken from the bill for the reason that the work required by the Government of its printers in this city is peculiar work for which higher wages would be paid in the cities named. Now, I suggest to him that the provision of the bill is that the wages of these persons in the employment of the Government shall not be "above the average price paid for similar work in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore"—"similar work." Therefore the entire argument of the gentleman on this point falls to the ground.

It seems to me that the objection to the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is that it leaves Congress in respect to its printing work in the power of the printers' union. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] makes a similar mistake. He undertakes to tell us that this matter makes no difference to the Government, because these men are paid by the thousand ems, and therefore whether they work more or fewer hours the Government loses nothing. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in his theory. The trouble lies in fixing the price per thousand ems. The price now fixed, sixty cents per thousand ems, is from 25 to 50 per cent. higher than the price in the cities named. Now, I insist that it is our duty to the Government to see that some certain fair price shall be fixed. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says the matter should be left where it now is—in the hands of the Congressional Printer; that he can control it. No, sir; the great difficulty is that the printers control him. They have a union which embraces a majority of all the printers in this city; consequently the price at the Government Printing Office controls the price paid for printing throughout the city. So long as you maintain the price at sixty cents per thousand ems this union controls not only the Congressional Printer but also all others employing printers in this city; because if the Congressional Printer deems it unfair to the Government to employ printers at sixty cents per thousand ems, every printer in the city belonging to this union, and of course standing by its rules, will decline to work for the Government, and thus the Congressional Printer, who is obliged to get work executed for Congress, is left helpless.

Mr. MYERS. I state it as a fact that before the present arrangement was made many of these printers received thirty or forty dollars a week; now they can make but twenty-four dollars a week.

Mr. DONNAN. I do not know what their present pay amounts to; I only know that they are receiving from 25 to 50 per cent. higher wages than printers are receiving for similar work in the cities of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York. I hope, therefore, that the Committee of the Whole will stand by the proposition submitted in the bill. I do not believe there is any material difference between the cost of living in this city and the cost in the cities named. There is at any rate no difference corresponding with the difference made by the printers' union in the price of work. I submit a table exhibiting the comparative prices of coal, provisions, &c., in the cities of New York and Philadelphia as compared with Washington:

Commodities.	New York.	Philadelphia.	Washington.
Flour, per barrel	$9 00@$12 00	$10 00@$11 00	$8 00@$11 00
Coal, per ton	7 00@ 7 50	7 00@ 8 00	8 00@ 10 00
Coffee, green, per pound	20@ 30	35@ 45	27@ 40
Coffee, roasted, per pound	30@ 45	40@ 55	30@ 45
Ham, per pound	15@ 20	15@ 17	16@ 18
Beef, per pound	8@ 30	20@ 25	8@ 20
Fresh pork, per pound	10@ 12	14@ 15	10@ 13
Butter, per pound	30@ 45	40@ 60	35@ 50

If, in the judgment of the Committee of the Whole, 5 per cent. should be added in consideration of the average difference in the cost of living, then let that limitation be specified; but let us not maintain the present prices, which are from 25 to 50 per cent. higher than those prevailing in neighboring cities; a system not only expensive to the Government, but to all other printing establishments in this city.

Mr. COBURN. What is the price paid in other cities?

Mr. DONNAN. I have a schedule at my room and had intended to have it here; but the prices paid by the Government in this city are from 25 to 50 per cent. higher.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to inquire whether a printer working eight hours a day at the present rates receives as much pay as a first-class clerk in one of the Departments?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why should he not?

Mr. DONNAN. I presume he receives as much working eight hours a day as he did formerly working ten hours a day.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I do not believe that a printer ought to get less than a first class clerk.

Mr. DONNAN. I hope we shall not longer continue the present expensive system.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask for the reading of a petition which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

We, the undersigned practical printers in the city of Washington, respectfully petition your honorable body to stay further proceedings in relation to fixing by law a scale of prices for work performed in any and all mechanical establishments carried on by the Government of the United States; because we hold it to be class legislation, in that it takes the side of capital against labor; that it would establish a bad precedent for the national Government to enact by law a standard of wages for the skilled labor of its citizens; that it would be unfair and unwise to pass a law which would, we believe, in principle, array the General Government against the toiling millions of the nation. Labor should be free to fix and regulate its value on the principles of justice, to be determined from time to time by the employer and employé.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield the remaining portion of my time to my colleague.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I want to give emphasis to this point. The work of these men is exceedingly irregular. Just now we may be ordering great volumes printed, making extraordinary demands on the Government Printing Office at a time. While they now may work all the night through and on Sundays, yet a few weeks or months hence there will not be work enough or quarter enough for them all. It is not right to calculate their earnings for a year upon the basis of their possible earnings for a day when they have plenty to do. We must recollect here are men with families to support who while they have a great deal to do at one time have but very little to do at other times. If you wish to make a law that they shall have only the average wages of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, then put into the bargain a guarantee that they live as cheaply and have as steady work as they might have in those cities.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the law of July 20, 1868, which is still upon the statute-book:

That all laws and parts of laws that regulate the prices of labor in the Government Printing Office be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to contract with the persons in that employment at such prices as are for the interest of the Government and are just to those employed.

That is a correct law. It is now the law, and this is really an irregular attempt to repeal existing law, an attempt made in a way discouraged by our rules.

The prices paid here are not too high. The daily morning papers of New York pay fifty-five cents a thousand when men work through the night, or fifty cents when part of the work is done in the afternoon. You pay on the RECORD sixty cents. On regular book-work, for a regular fair day's work that may last all the year round, a compositor gets in New York from forty-six to fifty cents a thousand. Here compositors have irregular work, it may be by day, it may be by night, there may be none at all; and the pay is not higher than it ought to be. A first-class printer in New York gets from twenty-five to thirty dollars a week, and it is not too high to pay these printers here twenty-four dollars a week. The average in New York is twenty-one dollars. These men claim twenty-four dollars, and they ought to have it. If they cannot show each night that they have set up four dollars' worth they lose in proportion. Mr. Clapp, the printer, says that if all the work were paid for by the piece it would have cost $250,000 more. The Senate report says the work is from 25 to 50 per cent. better and cheaper than it was under the contract system. I have some practical knowledge of this matter, employing some printers myself. Sometimes the printers' union fights us, sometimes we fight it; but we make out to arrange terms for ourselves. I do not think Congress ought to step in and interfere with such bargains. If I cannot without the help of special statutes on my side agree with the boys and carry on my business, then I will quit it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has claimed here to speak for the printers, for the laboring men, as other gentlemen have. They have, as it seems to me, made a mistake men sometimes do make of speaking not for a class but for the loudest of a class—for those who clamor the most.

Now, the committee in this clause of the bill have not sought, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, to antagonize the interests of printers as laboring men, but to make them equal. It does not believe and I do not believe in a privileged printing bureau in Washington to the disadvantage of printers elsewhere. What we seek is to put them all on a level. There is no reason why the printer in the Government Printing Office here should fare better than the printer in the gentleman's town or my town or in any large city.

What is the fact with reference to the privileges the printers enjoy here in the Government Printing Office? In the first place they have the eight-hour rule, and that is a great advantage. In the New York establishments, in the Philadelphia establishments, in the Baltimore establishments, with hardly an exception, the ten-hour rule prevails. When a printer gets into the Government Printing Office he gains two hours.

Now, so far as inequality of work is concerned the observation of the committee is not different here in the Government Printing Office from private estabiishments.

The proof, sir, that the printers here enjoy special privileges is that the Public Printer to-day can get printers from the district represented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] from the district represented by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] and from my own State to come here. I myself have had applications—I presume other members have had applications to get printers into the Government Printing Office, because it is what is called a soft place. They are glad to come here. Now, if it be a hardship to work here, if the cost of living be greater than elsewhere, if the privileges enjoyed by the printers in the Public Printing Office are not apparent, why is it that the tide is constantly setting toward Washington? I do not believe that the printer finds that it costs any more to live here in Washington than in Philadelphia or New York. I do not know how it may be as to Baltimore. Then they have the further privilege that the eight-hour law gives.

What the committee sought here was to put these printers on an average footing with others. It is a fact that for every printer you take on here and put into the Government Printing Office out of every half-dozen that apply, you aggrieve five men where you only please one. The hardship is not that of the printer who has got the place he wants, who will not go out until he is turned out. Who ever heard of any body leaving the Government Printing Office and going to another city? I never did, and I say that we should speak here not for the printer alone who is in the Government Printing Office, but for the half-dozen others that cannot get in. It is a privileged class, and in speaking for the printer here we should bear in mind that there are other printers just as worthy with families to support in and out of printers' unions outside of the city of Washington as there are in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to say a word or two in support of the amendment to strike out these lines. I am opposed to this attempted legislation. It seems to me that a single class has been selected in this matter that ought the least to have been selected. You have here in Washington in the employ of the Government a large number of employés. We have $900 clerks, $1,200 clerks, $1,400 clerks, $1,600 clerks, and $1,800 clerks. No attempt has been made in this Congress to cut down the pay of any of these employés. They are to all intents and purposes laborers, laboring for the support of themselves and families. No attempt has been made, I say, to reduce their compensation. But there is selected for a reduction in their salaries a class of laborers who can the least endure it.

I do insist, Mr. Chairman, that it is more expensive to live here than it is in the other cities that are named. I dislike this style of legislation, that we shall fix a scale of compensation by saying that we shall pay here as much as is paid to this class of workmen in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. The old law is the correct one, that we shall pay what is a just, fair, and reasonable compensation to these employés. If you go to the printing office in the morning, you will find that all the workmen are at their places and at their desks precisely at the proper hour, whatever that hour may be. They are there all the time that they should be there. There is no shirking in the printing department of this Government. But go on the street any time up to half-past ten o'clock and you will find fourteen and sixteen hundred dollar clerks in the street. And go up the avenue any time in the day and you will find every class of clerks leaving the Departments from two and half-past two to three o'clock. These clerks in the Departments work from four hours and a half to six hours a day. We have never attempted to cut down their pay a single mill in this Congress. Now, here are workmen who work by the day and the night, working with their hands and their minds, and it is proposed to cut them down and make them, and them alone, the sufferers by this legislation.

I protest against striking at these men and these women who work in the printing department. They are the hardest worked employés in the Government to-day. You may go to the department and watch their labor. I know some men there who have said to me that they have never toiled in their lives as they have toiled in that department, many of them working night after night until morning. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] says to me, "Why don't they leave." That is no argument at all. Why may we not ask everybody else to leave? They are here with their families and they are poor, living from hand to mouth. And why should we tell those men to leave? They are entitled to a just compensation for their services.

Mr. BASS. I desire to say a single word.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate on this amendment is in order.

Mr. BECK. Is an amendment to the amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. BECK. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. To strike out the last word.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I move to strike out the two last words, and I do it for the purpose of saying that I do not think there is much to be made by striking down the pay of the employés in this particular business. The difficulty lies in ordering the printing itself. We are appropriating by this bill $1,645,507.66 for printing. So long as that large sum is allowed to remain in the bill, and that amount of money is expended for printing, of course the expenses of the Government cannot be kept down by pinching the workmen who perform the labor. The large amount of printing authorized and provided for is the source of all the wrongful expenditure.

How is that money spent? It is spent for publishing all sorts of documents in the various Departments, whatever they see fit to publish, and when printed they put their franks upon them and send them out as electioneering documents all over the country. The abolition of the franking privilege has not stopped this abuse nor curtailed it. It is being done to-day, and republican Senators and Representatives are being furnished with electioneering documents under the frank of the heads of these Departments as freely as they were before the pretended reform was inaugurated by abolishing the franking privilege.

A very remarkable debate occurred the other day—I cannot say where, it would be out of order to state the place, but among distinguished republican gentlemen—in which these abuses were being set forth by one member, when another rose in his place and used this language:

Mr. LEWIS. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Mississippi. He says the franking privilege was abused in the franking of political documents. I say that abuse has not been abolished yet. I have now in my room plenty of documents, not on Government business, but electioneering documents, franked with the official stamp upon them by officers of the Government.

The gentleman to whom that remark was made replied thus:

Mr. ALCORN. But, sir, how stands the fact to-day? You say to the people of the country "The franking privilege has been abolished." The fact stands out that it is not abolished; that every Executive Department of the Government to-day exercises the franking privilege, and there is no check on any of those Departments for the abuses that will necessarily grow up in the service, and actually to-day the abuses that may occur under the privilege which is now vouchsafed to the Departments are greater if anything than at the time the privilege was regulated under the old régime. The member of Congress to-day is denied the privilege of franking documents, it is true; but the Agricultural Department, the State Department, the Post-Office Department, all the Departments of the Government, send out their franks. They have them printed at the expense of the Government, and all they have to do to send a document to the limits of the nation is simply to put upon it a stamp which they have by the thousands and tens of thousands at their command. If you have a document that emanates from any of those Departments and you desire to have it go to your constituents without charge to you, you can send it to one of the Departments I presume, without having tried the matter, with your compliments to its head, and request him to send it, and he will put his stamp upon it and send it away. I know that is the case with regard to seeds, &c. The Commissioner of Agriculture sends out those seeds. So far as I was concerned, when the seeds came to me I sent them back to him and asked him to send them to my constituents. Why? Because he had a roll of stamps in his hands and could send them without charge, whereas if I were to send them I would have to pay the postage on them.

Both these gentlemen avowed, and nobody contradicted them—both being leading members of the republican party—that they are to-day furnished with electioneering documents with the stamp of the Departments upon them; not on official business, not on Department business, but to be sent all over the country for partisan purposes. You are pretending to the country that you have cut off great abuses by abolishing the franking privilege, when the reverse is admitted to be true. You must either stop this printing altogether, or limit it by law to special departmental work. The abuse is admitted to be horrid now. Both of those gentlemen day before yesterday, in the debate from which I have read and which can be found in the RECORD of the 9th of June, showed that this is the fact; both being leading republican Senators.

Mr. HOSKINS. I rise to oppose the amendment, and I do not propose to detain the committee over a minute and a half. But I do desire to call the attention of the committee to one fact. I am entirely in accord with the gentleman who moves to strike out these lines, for this reason if for no others: The clause as inserted by the committee says that the price paid shall not be above the average price paid in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. Now, in the cities of Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore there are different grades of printers; but in the Government Printing Office here I understand that none but first-class printers are employed, and if a man who is not skilled in his business gets in there he is immediately removed, and his place is filled by a first-class hand. Thus it will be seen that the average price in those three cities would not be the average price of skilled workmen, but the average price of a miscellaneous class of persons employed there, many of whom get different wages. If you pay to the printers in the Government Printing Office the average price of skilled workmen in the three cities named, you will pay them the full price paid now. I am therefore in favor of striking out these three lines inserted by the committee. I yield what time I have remaining to my colleague from the Buffalo district, [Mr. BASS.]

Mr. BASS. Mr. Chairman, I concur with the remarks made by my colleague who has just taken his seat. Is seems to me that if you impose upon the Congressional Printer the duty of determining what the average price of this class of labor is, as between the three cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, you are imposing on him a task somewhat difficult for him to perform. How is the price established at the present time? As I understood from one gentleman who has addressed the House, the same price is paid now in the Congressional Printing Office that has been paid there for years. Why is it that to-day we propose to reduce the prices paid these men for their services? Has any special emergency arisen within the last few months to call for any reduction of their pay? I am not aware that it is so claimed. This price is fixed by the Congressional Printer according to the best of his ability and skill. It is determined, somewhat, I understand, by the typographical union. That union establishes prices for the government of the persons who belong to that organization. Now, if the Congressional Printer were required to fix a different scale of prices, to determine an average price, to be arrived at upon a computation of the prices paid in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and to pay the average so ascertained, then next week we might have a strike of the printers in this city. If the private employers in the city are paying the same prices that the Government Printing Office is paying these printers to-day, then if the Government Printing Office reduces the price of its printers, the office would be emptied, and the town would be filled with men thrown out of employment.

The trades union representing the printers represents thousands of men all over the country. This is the first attempt on the part of Congress to strike a blow at labor organizations as they exist in every city and almost every hamlet in the United States. I am opposed therefore to the proposition of the committee and in favor of striking it out.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. STORM. I move to amend by adding to the portion of the paragraph it is proposed to strike out that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Congressional Printer shall furnish in his annual report a detailed statement of all printing and binding done by him for Congress and the different Departments of the Government; and he shall also state in said annual report the quality and price of all paper used in each item of printing and binding: Provided, That from and after the close of the present fiscal year the Congressional Printer shall print no records of cases pending in the Court of Claims or in the Supreme Court, unless the United States shall be appellant or plaintiff in error therein; but in cases wherein the United States is not appellant or plaintiff in error, the record shall be printed, under the direction of the court, at the cost of the party bringing such record into court, which cost in the Supreme Court shall be taxed as any other costs in the case.

Mr. GARFIELD. I raise the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] proposes to change existing law in regard to printing.

The CHAIRMAN. If it does not change the law it is entirely useless; if it does change the law, then it is out of order.

Mr. STORM. It is simply a limitation upon the appropriation made in this paragraph. It does not strike out the appropriation for the printing of the Supreme Court or the Court of Claims. It simply provides that wherever private parties are the litigants the United States shall not pay the cost of printing the records in those cases. Whoever heard of taxing the Government for printing the records of cases between private parties in suits in United States courts?

Mr. GARFIELD. It has always been done in the United States court here.

Mr. STORM. It has not. The rule has only recently been adopted. The chief justice of the Court of Claims, in order to prevent fraud as he said, made an order that the records in these cases should be printed by the Congressional Printer.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman understand that his amendment requires the Congressional Printer to do anything which the law does not require him now to do?

Mr. STORM. I maintain that the law does not now require that he shall print the records in cases where private parties only are interested. My amendment is only a limitation on this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the amendment to require the Congressional Printer to do something that the law does not now require him to do. If so, then it is a change of existing law, and is not in order.

Mr. STORM. It is not a law, but simply an order made by the chief justice of the Court of Claims. I maintain that my amendment does not change existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DONNAN. I move to amend the last portion of the paragraph by inserting before the word "average" the words "more than 5 per cent. above," so that it will read "shall not be more than 5 per cent. above the average price paid for similar work," &c.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am not authorized by the Committee on Appropriations to accept any amendment that they have not been consulted upon. But for myself I can well understand that there is a certain amount of truth in the proposition that the cost of living is higher in Washington than it is in other cities; just how much higher I do not know.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is it just 5 per cent. higher?

Mr. GARFIELD. I say I do not know. I admit also that in the printing office here there is probably required more night-work, and there is probably less steady work than in most of the printing offices of the country. And if we were wise enough to know what difference all these relations make between the three cities named here and the city of Washington, I should be very willing to fix a rate accordingly. In order that no injustice may be done, I will say that I see no reason why we might not limit the price to be paid to 5 per cent. above the average price paid in the cities named. The Government Printer would not be obliged to give that price; he may pay the average, and not pay 5 per cent. above the average.

I think the rights of both parties, those of the contractor and of the employed, should be considered here. And I think that the rights of printers outside of Government employment should be considered, as well as the rights of those employed by the Government. When gentlemen undertake to say that a raid is being made against the interests of labor, they ought to be reminded that they are making a raid against everybody outside of this particular preferred class. It is a raid against the many in favor of the few. I propose that we deal fairly and justly with the whole class of people known as printers and binders; and it is not dealing fairly with them to take a few of their class and give them the special advantage of Government employment here at advanced rates of pay, sowing discontent in all the ranks of that employment in all other cities of the United States. This is the reason every member of Congress is beset by printers from private offices throughout the country to find them places in this capital.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is now admitted that the provision in the bill is wrong because the committee themselves desire to amend it, so as to fix a higher rate. Now why not leave the whole question to be regulated by natural law? My objection to the proposition is that it is the entering-wedge of an attempt to fix the rate of wages by law. That never has been done in this country; it never ought to be done; I trust that we shall not begin here any such effort. That is the ground upon which I oppose this, as a raid upon all laboring men; because if we can fix the pay for printers why not for bricklayers, why not for carpenters, why not for cabinet-makers, why not for all laboring men?

A MEMBER. We fix it for Congressmen.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We do fix it for Congressmen because that is a constitutional privilege we have; but there are a great many of us who dare not fix it at what we think we ought to have.

Mr. RANDALL. I echo that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But we have a right to do justice to these men; and I am willing to take the odium of voting that their pay shall not be cut down. By rejecting the proposition in this bill we neither cut down nor raise their pay. We leave the Government in this matter to deal with citizens as citizens deal with each other. We merely say that we will not throw the great weight of the Government sword into the scale as against the laboring man by saying that he shall receive only so much.

The answer is not to be made "If these men do not like this rate of pay let them leave the Government employment and go away." They cannot go away. They are tied here as was Gulliver in Lilliput by every hair of their heads. The church and all other social influences are around them as they are around us. If they go away they must tear up everything by the roots. A man who is fixed here must, when his employment ceases, stay here until he can get employment again.

Nor is it any answer to say "We have authorized eight hours as a day's labor instead of ten." That measure was either wise or unwise. If wise, these men have a right to it; if unwise, let us repeal it for all Government work; but let us not strike down the printers and book-binders in Washington alone, while in all other Government work eight hours' labor is the rule and the pay given is the same paid by other employers in the same city.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. DONNAN, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 16, noes not counted.

Mr. COBURN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the true way to manage labor and to insure a fair compensation to the laborer is to have it free, not to cramp it by legislative restrictions. The law at present leaves this labor free. It authorizes the Congressional Printer to employ persons at such prices as are for the interest of the Government and just to those employed. That is the basis upon which every man employs his hands. It is the true basis, the reasonable basis. If it happens that there are not in this city enough printing-offices to attract printers in large numbers so as to bring down the price of work to a level with that paid in Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, that is not the fault of the Government. The Government, therefore, should not take advantage of anything of that kind. It should not undertake to prescribe any special terms as to labor here, which we all know may necessarily be dearer than elsewhere. This is a peculiar city; it is not a city of manufactures or commerce or trade. It is a city whose population is made up largely of Government employés—just that kind of population that does not bring down the prices of labor—just that kind of population that carries up the price of living in every branch. We all know as a matter of fact that living is higher here than it is in neighboring cities. I suppose that statistics, if they should be examined, would abundantly sustain this position.

Something has been said here about the eight-hour law. Now, in in my judgment that law will be in effect repealed by the proposed provision of this bill, because this provision authorizes the Congressional Printer to fix the price of labor at the average of other cities named; and in making the calculation he will doubtless include the hours of labor as well as the rate of pay per day or by the thousand ems, whatever it may be. I believe that by this means the eight-hour law will be indirectly swept away. I do not think it can be fairly argued in favor of the proposition that under the eight-hour law the printers in this city receive equal pay with those who work ten hours in other places. I believe they are not paid by the day, but rather by the thousand ems.

I see nothing in this provision that can in the end result to the advantage of the Government. These men, many of them, come here from distant States—from all parts of the country; they have to pay their traveling expenses; they may not be employed here permanently; they may, like the door-keepers or clerks of this House, or like members of Congress themselves, be occupied here during only the sessions of Congress. All these men cannot be employed the year round. The same argument upon which we base increased pay for our clerks, door-keepers, and other employés beyond what would be paid for the same class of employment elsewhere—that they are here but a part of the year, and that any arrangements they might make for doing business elsewhere are broken up—that very same argument applies in favor of these printers. If they had regular employment from one end of the year to the other the case would be different; but large numbers of them are employed only a part of the year, and when thrown out of employment they must necessarily seek it elsewhere.

Mr. MARSHALL. Is an amendment in order at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moved a formal amendment; does he withdraw it?

Mr. COBURN. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL. I desire to move an amendment in the thirty-fifth line, so it will read "not more than 6 per cent. above the average price paid."

I do it, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of saying I think the clause which it is proposed to strike out is misunderstood by a considerable portion of the members of the committee. It is an attempt on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to reform what is now a most glaring abuse. I am opposed, and I think the House ought to be opposed, to placing this establishment on any other than business principles. If it is intended to make it a separate Bureau, and give fixed salaries to the employés of that Bureau, then it would be proper to do so; but I imagine it has been the purpose of Congress to place this establishment on strictly business principles.

What is the condition under which labor in this establishment is employed at the present time? The Government has no control whatever of the price to be paid. What is the price to be paid? That price is determined by the men in the employ of the Government. The price paid is absolutely within their own control. It is known to every man here who has any information upon this subject at all that there is nothing upon earth to control the price paid at the Government Printing Office except what may be determined by these men themselves who are in the employ of the Government.

What is the result of all this? Instead of being employed on business principles, these men are put in that office through the influence of members of Congress. Printers are gathered here from all parts of the country, for they think this is a favored establishment and the Government is paying here more than in other business establishments of the country. As a consequence they are put in there by their members of Congress of the dominant party by favoritism.

What is the result of that? They claim the right when elections take place in the districts from which they come that they shall be sent home to vote, and they are sent home to vote through the influence of their member of Congress at the expense of the Government. These printers go home and vote at the public expense for the member of Congress who put them in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. COBURN. Does the gentleman from Illinois mean to say that these printers are sent home at the expense of the Government? What evidence has he for that assertion? I understand they are not sent home at the expense of the Government.

Mr. MARSHALL. It appeared in evidence before the Committee on Appropriations and is beyond question that these men are granted leave of absence for ten days and they get their expenses and their pay during all the time they are absent at home voting for the member of Congress who placed them in their positions.

Mr. COBURN. I think the gentleman from Illinois is entirely mistaken.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. It has not been so in my State, and I never heard of it in reference to any other State.

Mr. MARSHALL. Nevertheless these clerks here do get their expenses paid when they are sent home and elections are to be held in the districts from which they come.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I am inclined to believe that such is not the case.

Mr. LAWRENCE rose.

Mr. MARSHALL. I cannot yield if it is to be taken out of my time, as I only have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. MARSHALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have only stated what is the fact, and what has been proved to be the fact before the Committee on Appropriations. It is a notorious fact that the clerks of the Departments have the same privilege of going home at the expense of the Government. They get leave of absence through the influence of the men who put them in position. This is all wrong. It is an abuse which has grown up in the Government and ought to be corrected. As this is not a Bureau, but a mere business establishment; it certainly ought to be corrected here.

If the amount fixed by this clause in the appropriation bill is not sufficient, then put it up not exceeding 6 per cent. in addition to the average of what is paid to employés in private establishments in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia. I wish to have the price fixed, and not left within the control of the men employed there. It is not now within the control of the Government Printer. There is here a printers' union which fixes the price, and a majority of that printers' union are men who have come here from all parts of the country. They have fixed the price to be paid by publishers in this city and this breaks down the business of these private printing establishments, which is a gross wrong to them.

If you are not paying enough by these appropriation bills, then let us name an adequate amount so that at least this Government establishment shall be based on something like business principles. Do not let it any longer remain one of those cancerous ulcers which are eating into the body-politic. It is an injustice as it is now and the object of the Committee on Appropriations is to correct the abuse. I must say of the majority of the members of the Committee on Appropriations in this House that instead of reproach they deserve credit for attempting to correct this, as they have a great many other abuses during the present Congress. For myself I feel it to be my duty to appear hear and try to uphold the hands of that committee and the efforts it has made to correct here what is no doubt a monstrous abuse. If the committee does not regulate here what the price shall be it will leave it in the hands of the employés of the Government to determine how much the Government shall pay them, and it will surely injure as it has done the regular business of this city and elsewhere throughout the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 61; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. MARSHALL, and Mr. HAWLEY of Connecticut.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 75.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOSKINS. I move to strike out all after the word "paid" in line 35, and in lieu thereof to insert "for similar work done in the city of Washington."

Mr. Chairman, if we are to fix the price for these printers in the Government Printing Office by some schedule or some direct and definite law, to which I am opposed, I propose that it shall be fixed, so far as my vote is concerned, by the price of such labor here in this place where they are obliged to do their work. In my mind there is no sense in regulating the price of the labor of these printers, who are skilled artisans, by what the price may be in other cities of the Union. These men are obliged to live here in the city of Washington, and not in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore; nor can they live in those cities; they must reside here.

The chairman of the committee has yielded the whole point when he admits, as he has done, that the cost of living here is greater than in the three cities named. And if it be more expensive to live here in Washington than in those other cities, the rates of wages these men should get, so long as it is conceded that they ought to be first-class workmen, should be somewhat in proportion to the cost of living here. Their rates of wages should have reference to the cost of living in the place where they are employed.

Now, I desire to say a word or two on another point which I have heard raised on this floor, that if these men are not willing to take the price now paid by the Government Printer, which I believe is at the rate of fifty cents an hour, others will. In answer to that suggestion I will say that there is not a member of this House, representing a congressional district where a hundred men could not be found willing to take his place for the pay he is now getting. I propose to treat these men fairly, not giving them what we give ourselves, but a fair compensation for the labor they are expected to do. And I believe if the Public Printer is a man fitted for the place he occupies the law should remain as it now is, allowing him to pay such compensation as in his judgment is fitting and proper for the services which these men are rendering.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the whole provision contained in these four lines. But if we are to have this provision, let us establish the price with reference to the prices paid in the place where these men do their work.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is a proposition to pay them 6 per cent. more than they ask.

Mr. CONGER. If this were a proposition the exact nature of which any member of this House could understand or which could be ascertained by any sort of calculation, I would vote for it. But I venture to say that if this provision be adopted the Congressional Printer, if he executes the law, will be required to spend at least two-thirds of every month in the year in these cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore examining all the rates of pay for similar kinds of work in those cities in order that he may be able to establish the rates for Government employés here. Who doubts that proposition? In saying two-thirds of every month I may be saying too much. The Congressional Printer, if he was active and worked nights, might have to spend only half of each month in finding out what were the rates of wages for similar work in each of those cities. Therefore I say this proposition of the committee is entirely impracticable.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is the same principle as is adopted in relation to the navy-yards and wherever you employ expert labor, that the workmen shall be employed at the average price paid for similar work.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman's argument is in favor of the amendment of my friend from New York, [Mr. HOSKINS;] because in the case he refers to the work is paid for according to the price paid for similar work in the town or city where the navy-yard is. I submit that the proposition of the committee is utterly impracticable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not heard, nor has anybody pretended, that the Congressional Printer has paid improper rates for work since he has had the public printing in charge. Nobody suggests such a thing. He hires men, the best he can get, under his responsibility to this Government and knowing that he is watched by those who have attacked or may attack him here, for the Congressional Printer has not escaped an attack upon this floor any session of the House since I have been a member of Congress. He hires men, as he is bound to do in the interest of the Government, for the lowest price for which he can obtain them to do the work well. And the work must be done well if it is done at all. Does anybody complain? Do the printers, do the public, do the democrats, do the republicans of this House ever complain that the Congressional Printer has not paid these men just the wages they earn, no more, no less?

Mr. DONNAN. He pays them just what they ask.

Mr. CONGER. He pays them just what he considers is right, watched as he knows he is by the eagle eyes of every member of this House and exposed to every kind of attack.

Mr. MYERS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate on this amendment is in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for a vote.

Mr. MYERS. Is an amendment to the amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. MYERS. I would like to have the privilege of saying a word or two on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate on it is in order.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOSKINS to the amendment, there were—ayes 49, noes 65; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and Mr. HOSKINS and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 16, noes not counted.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now ask unanimous consent that all debate be closed on the pending paragraph.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The question being upon the motion to strike out the last clause of the paragraph as amended, it was put; and on a division there were ayes 75, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading, and under the heading "For life-saving stations" read as follows:

For one hundred and two keepers of stations, at $200 each, $20,400.

Mr. RANDALL. I find that the number of these keepers appropriated for last year was fifty-four, and now there is a provision for one hundred and two. Why is this increase?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman is mistaken as to the number appropriated for last year. He puts it too low. But the increase, such as it is, has been made by acts of Congress that have provided for additional keepers, and the appropriation here is simply to provide for them. The committee have not gone beyond the provisions of law.

The Clerk read as follows:

For building a steam revenue vessel for the Pacific coast, $125,000.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend that clause by striking out "a" and inserting the words "an iron;" so that it will read:

For building an iron steam revenue vessel for the Pacific coast, $125,000.

I wish to say one word in reference to that amendment. The expense of building an iron vessel now for this service is very little greater than that of building one of wood. An iron vessel of this description is much more fitted for the service. It will last three or four times as long as a wooden vessel. The Government has made the experiment in regard to vessels of this class and have had opportunities of comparing the length of time which an iron vessel will last in this service with the time that a wooden vessel will last. A wooden vessel lasts only one-third as long as an iron vessel, so that you would have to build three vessels of wood during the same time that one of iron would last. An iron vessel is better fitted for this service on the Pacific coast, and I think it is wise policy to build all these vessels of iron unless the disparity in price between iron and wooden vessels is great, which it is not. I think they can be made for exactly the same price, although formerly it cost something more to build an iron vessel than a wooden one. I therefore offer this amendment, and desire to test the sense of the committee upon it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. One of the Senators who represents the State of Oregon appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and asked for an appropriation for the construction of this steam revenue vessel, and we concluded to give it to him. The gentleman from Michigan on my right, who seems to represent the Pacific coast here in the House, comes up here and asks what neither the Department nor the Senator from Oregon who appeared before the committee did ask. Undoubtedly he knows more about their wants than anybody who appeared before the committee.

I do not fully agree with him as to the merits of wood and iron vessels; but I do not want that question precipitated upon the House. It is not stated in this clause which the committee put in the bill whether this revenue-cutter shall be of wood or iron. It will be in the discretion of the Department who have built dozens of these vessels in years past, and who know the merits of wood and iron, and who know whether an iron cutter is better in the waters of Oregon than a wooden cutter, and who know also if it is the reverse and that a wooden cutter is better, to determine which it shall be. In incorporating the clause into the bill the committee left the matter open. They provided only for a steam revenue-cutter. Now, I do not see why the gentleman should force the House here by his amendment to provide that this vessel shall be constructed of iron in case the Department prefer to build it of wood. Is not the gentleman willing to trust the Department with the interest of the Government in this respect? I am a wooden-vessel man; but although I had the preparation of this part of the bill, I did not pretend to put in that which would carry out my own theories about ship-building and tie down the Department to a wooden vessel. Is there any more fairness in the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan, to tie them down to an iron vessel, than there would have been if I had tried to tie them down to a wooden vessel? Let us leave the clause as it is, and then if the gentleman has any argument either to the Department or to his constituents in Oregon for iron vessels, let him make it, and perhaps they will build this vessel of iron; but leave it, at least, in the discretion of the Department.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman moves to amend his own amendment.

Mr. CONGER. No, sir; I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not germane to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. CONGER. It is; it proposes to perfect the amount to be appropriated.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] says ironically that I know more about this than he does and more than some others do. The gentleman need not have made that statement ironically; the House knew it without his saying so. The point of the irony fails because of the truth of the remark.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Who knows it?

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman knows it, and if he is as honest as I am he will say what he thinks. The gentleman has not made one single objection to the force of the argument which I used for the construction of an iron vessel, because he cannot do so. He cannot give any good reason why this clause should not be amended as I have proposed. He says that in preparing this clause he left it so that the Department should not be bound to a wooden vessel, requiring to be rebuilt in ten years. In that the gentleman exercised his usual good sense. But I go a step further, and ask that this bill shall provide for an economically built vessel which will last. Last year after full discussion Congress directed vessels of this class to be built of iron. Those vessels have been so built, and are found to meet exactly the demands of the service. They are the best kind of ships, and the most economical, and we ought to look at that consideration. The gentleman has no interest in this vessel; it is not going to the coast of Maine.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Nor is it to go to the Michigan lakes.

Mr. CONGER. Nor is there any iron manufactory in my district. But I thank God I can rise above anything that pertains merely to the coast of Michigan or the coast of Maine.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. O, the gentleman can fly very high.

Mr. CONGER. Yes; and I can go horizontally, too, and look at the whole country spread before me and its interests. Now, if there is any objection to this, any reason why this amendment should not be adopted, then let the gentleman arise in his place and state it. I withdraw the formal amendment to the amendment.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. CONGER to insert the words "an iron" before the words "steam revenue vessel."

Mr. BURLEIGH. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. It is known that many iron ships navigating the ocean have been lost in consequence of the variation of the compass on board the ships. A revenue-cutter is continually running along the coast from headland to headland. It is very necessary that the compasses on ships shall be reliable, and it is almost impossible to rely on a compass on an iron ship. I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment was not agreed to, upon a division ayes 31, noes not counted.

The following was read:

National currency:

For paper, engraving, printing, express charges, and other expenses of making and issuing the national currency, $110,000.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move to amend the clause just read by adding to it the following words: "to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

The amendment was agreed to.

The following was read:

For expenses in detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other securities of the United States, and the coinage thereof, and for detecting other frauds upon the Government, $125,000.

Mr. RANDALL. The same addition should be made to this paragraph which was made to the last. There has been a great deal of scandal concerning the manner in which this money has heretofore been expended. We ought to have some officer held directly responsible for the honest expenditure of this money.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no objection to putting in the words indicated; it does not change the law. This money is now expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For payment of the necessary expenses incurred in defending suits against the Secretary of the Treasury, or his agents, for the seizure of captured or abandoned property; and for the examination of witnesses in claims against the United States pending in any Department; and for the defense of the United States in the Court of Claims, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General, $30,000.

Mr. COX. I want to go back to the paragraph in relation to the expenses of the courts of the United States.

The paragraph referred to was as follows:

JUDICIARY.

For defraying the expenses of the courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia; for jurors and witnesses and expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, of prosecutions for offenses committed against the United States; for the safe-keeping of prisoners; and for the expenses which may be incurred in the enforcement of the act relative to the right of citizens to vote, of February 28, 1871, or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, $3,000,000.

Mr. COX. I want to have a bill of particulars.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to going back.

Mr. COX. I could not stop the Clerk as he was reading.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not want to stop him.

Mr. COX. He went on with a momentum that was terrific.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to going back.

Mr. COX. Then the people will go back on your bill.

The Clerk read the following:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the amount of three several judgments rendered by the circuit and district court for the southern district of Ohio, against Reuben H. Stephenson, the surveyor of the port of Cincinnati, $1,016.86.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to strike out this paragraph. I would like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to state how these judgments were obtained, whether they have been before the Committee on the Judiciary, and in what manner they came before the Committee on Appropriations. These claims usually go first to the Committee on Claims or to some other appropriate committee. Now we know nothing about this matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. These are regular judgments of a court. The Secretary of the Treasury forwarded a letter to the Committee on Appropriations, saying that so much money was needed to pay these judgments, and showing what the judgments of the court were. This appropriation is reported upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. The matter was referred to a sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations and that sub-committee have found that these are regular judgments of the court, and there is nothing left us to do but to pay these judgments.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio why interest is not allowed in this case when it is allowed at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum in the very next case following this in this bill? We are not in the habit of allowing interest on these claims. Why is it not allowed in this instance when it is allowed in the next?

Mr. GARFIELD. We follow the judgment of the court itself. The gentleman will find on pages 7, 8, 9, and 10 of the report of the committee a full statement of the facts in this case, together with all the papers bearing upon it. On page 7 is the letter of the Attorney-General; that is followed by a letter from the Solicitor-General; then there is another letter from the Attorney-General, addressed to the United States attorney at Cincinnati; then follow a series of letters concerning the judgment provided for in the next paragraph of the bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. What reason can be given for allowing interest in the one case and not in the other?

Mr. GARFIELD. No other reason than that we have followed the judgment of the court.

Mr. DUNNELL. I withdraw my motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the introduction of shad into the waters of the Pacific States, the Gulf States, and of the Mississippi Valley, and of salmon, white-fish, and other useful food fishes into the waters of the United States to which they are best adapted, $17,500, to be expended under the direction of the United States commissioner of fish and fisheries.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move to amend this paragraph by making the appropriation $50,000 instead of $17,500. It has been shown in the report of the United States commissioner on the subject how important fish are as an element of human food; and in view of that fact an appropriation of $17,500 seems almost a mockery. Some thirteen years ago a few black bass were thrown into the Potomac from the water-tank of a passing train; and now not only this river but all its tributaries for many miles up are filled with the finest bass fish imaginable, furnishing food for thousands of people. If gentlemen will reflect for a moment on the number of persons in the United States with whom fish is a main article of food, they will see the importance of this question. The whole country is waking up to the importance of the culture of fish, for the interest of the rich and the poor. I hope, therefore, that $50,000 will be appropriated, to be expended by the commissioner of fish for the purpose indicated in the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment, and ask for a vote.

Mr. KASSON. What was the estimate?

Mr. GARFIELD. The estimate was $17,500. Let us stand by that.

Mr. FRYE. Let me say a single word. Seventeen thousand five hundred dollars will furnish more food fish for the rivers of this country to-day that $50,000 would have furnished five years ago before the United States commenced this work. At that time we paid forty-five dollars a thousand in gold for the eggs of salmon and trout. To-day, by the help of the United States, through these appropriations, we are getting such eggs for four dollars a thousand, and sending them over the country.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman consider this appropriation sufficient?

Mr. FRYE. I am inclined to think it is. The States, led on by the United States, are now doing this work themselves to a very large extent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. This appropriation is for "the introduction of shad into the waters of the Pacific States, the Gulf States, and of the Mississippi Valley, and of salmon, white-fish, and other useful food fishes into the waters of the United States to which they are best adapted." Now, how can $17,500 be sufficient to supply the whole country from east to west? It would cost almost that amount to transport upon the railroads of the country the person who attends to this business, saying nothing of the cost of buying the fish.

The amendment of Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the thirteen crippled and disabled soldiers now in the employment of the Door-keeper of the House of Representatives, from July 1 to December 7, 1874, $9,653.20.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to amend by adding after the paragraph just read the following:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay for extra clerical services in the Committee on War Claims, rendered necessary by reports of the commissioners of claims, $500.

The amendment has the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on War Claims. It was necessary to have these clerical services in order to prepare the papers of the southern claims commissioners as reported to us for the action of the House. It was impossible for the regular clerk of the committee to do all this work; and we had detailed from the office of the commissioners of claims a clerk, Mr. Everett, who I may say is a relative of Edward Everett, and who was serving at a salary of $1,200 a year. But instead of being occupied during only the usual hours of labor, from nine a. m. to three p. m., he has been obliged, while detailed for service in connection with our committee clerk, to work almost regularly the whole day and evening up to ten o'clock in preparing papers and completing the proofs in connection with the report of the commissioners. He has also been required to examine cases previously reported whenever any precedents or other information were called for. Over four thousand cases have been reported to Congress from that commission since its organization. I trust there will be no objection on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to this amendment. I admit that the person who will receive this money is now drawing a salary of $1,200; but since the 1st of January he has been occupied every day and as late as ten o'clock at night. He is as faithful a clerk as there is in the service or employ of any committee of this House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend by adding after the amendment just adopted the following:

That an amount sufficient for that purpose is hereby appropriated to enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay from the date of the salary-repeal act of January 20, 1874, the additional sums required to restore the salary of the assistant disbursing clerk, the principal engrossing clerk, and the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations to the rate of compensation each received the day prior to that date.

This amendment provides for three old and most efficent servants of the House, gentlemen who have been here for many years, the disbursing clerk, Mr. Bailey, and the chief engrossing clerk, Mr. Strohm, who have been here some twenty years and whose character for fidelity is as familiar to the House as the Clerk's desk, and the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations. We raised their salaries to what we thought was right when we were attempting to adjust the salaries of the various officers of the House, but by the repeal of the salary act last January we cut them down. It seems to me they should have no less than we gave them by our former legislation, and it is no more than right we should restore them to what we gave them at that time. They are men who have given a life-time almost to our service here. If well-doing can entitle them to consideration, well-doing certainly abundantly entitles them. I do not wish to protract the debate but submit the proposition to the fair consideration of the House, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to make the point of order on the amendment that it changes existing law.

Mr. ARCHER. The gentleman's point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes too late, as the proposition has been debated.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is, it seems to me, somewhat ungracious in my friend from Ohio to make a point on this amendment even if he could make it.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 55; no quorum voting.

Mr. MAYNARD. I demand tellers, for it is manifest the committee have failed to apprehend the nature of the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MAYNARD and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope gentlemen of the committee will examine the amendment, and they will see it is just and ought to be passed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 26, noes not counted.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not ask for any further count.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the widow of David B. Mellish, late a member of this House, a sum equal to the salary of a member of Congress from the date of the death of said Mellish to the date of the election of his successor, $2,288.

Mr. WOODFORD. I desire to offer the following amendment:

Strike out in lines 209 and 210, on pages 9 and 10, the words "to the date of the election of his successor, $2,288," and insert in lieu thereof the words "to the end of the Forty-third Congress, $3,698."

I desire simply to state the amendment I offer is in accordance with the direction of the House given to this committee a few days since, and I send the following extract from the RECORD to be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARY OF THE LATE MR. MELLISH.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for adoption at this time:

"Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to cause to be paid from the contingent fund of the House to the widow of David B. Mellish, deceased, late a member of this House, a sum equal to the amount of his salary as a member of this House from the date of his death to the end of the Forty-third Congress."

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman to ask authority for such a provision to be put on the deficiency bill, which will be up for consideration in a few days. We cannot pay that out of the contingent fund of the House very well without having trouble with the accounting officers of the Treasury. If he will just ask consent of the House to let it be put on the deficiency bill I think it would be better.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will do so.

No objection being made, leave was accordingly granted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the order just made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOODFORD. Now, by inadvertence of course, the Committee on Appropriations have omitted to do that which the House unanimously directed, and of course they will be glad to have this opportunity to make the correction and carry out the suggestion of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, chairman of that committee. That is all I think I need say to the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. It seems, Mr. Chairman, ungracious to oppose anything which appeals so much to the sympathies of gentlemen as this does, but the same day on which this proposition was sent to the Committee on Appropriations a law was passed providing that hereafter, in the case of the death of any member, his pay should be delivered to his widow or heirs up to the date of the election of his successor. This will disarrange the law for the future. In this case it is trice the language of the resolution read seems to indicate another rule, but the resolution itself authorizes the Committee on Appropriations to put it in. It did not ask them to bring it in the very language of the resolution. There were no directory words in the resolution itself. It was sent to the Committee on Appropriations, and at the time this Committee on Appropriations had this matter under consideration they believed it their duty to look over the precedents, and they found, so far as the history of cases will show, that in no case has the pay of a deceased member been continued to the end of the Congress to which he had been elected.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I think the chairman of the committee is mistaken, as it appears there was the case of Mr. Speer, of Georgia, whose pay was given to his family up to the end of the Congress to which he was elected.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is true they paid his family up to the end of the session, which in that case happened to be the end of the Congress; but the language of the resolution did not say end of the Congress but the end of the session, which of course was tantamount to the end of the Congress in that case.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Let me correct the gentleman. Mr. Speer, of Georgia, died in May or June during the recess between the first and second sessions. His successor was chosen in the fall, but Mr. Speer's family were paid his salary till the close of that Congress, which was on the 4th of March following. It was an exceptional case, I admit.

Mr. GARFIELD. It seemed to the committee that it would be very unwise to set a precedent which might be applied to the case of a member who died in the first week of a Congress. The committee were influenced in making the recommendation they do by the desire to avoid just such a precedent as that, and by the consideration also that for a proper and wise reason gentlemen here, members of Congress—and I would not have named it but for this discussion—have contributed out of their own funds or authorized the Sergeant-at-Arms to pay over to the widow of Mr. Mellish twenty-five dollars each. I think several thousand dollars have been raised in that way. And the Committee on Appropriations thought it desirable that the individual sympathies of members of the House should be shown in that form rather than we should set a precedent which would be inconvenient hereafter by providing for this payment to the end of the Congress.

Mr. CROOKE. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order to refer to the individual action of members of the House?

Mr. GARFIELD. I was in order in what I said. I only regret that the offering of this amendment should have made it necessary for me to have said it. I hope the House will not set a precedent in this case which would be a bad precedent to follow hereafter.

Mr. CONGER. When the House was considering the bill fixing the mode of payment in the case of the death of a member I rose in my place and moved an amendment which would have excepted the case of Mr. Mellish from the operation of that law, as the records I presume will show. When I offered that amendment the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and other gentlemen suggested that the case of Mr. Mellish would be provided for by a separate provision in an appropriation bill; and upon that suggestion I withdrew the amendment. I believe it was the judgment of the House at that time, although it did not come to a vote, that that case should have been excepted from the law; and I withdrew the motion to except the case from that law on the express understanding, and which was agreed to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] that he would prepare the resolution, which immediately afterward received the sanction of the House. Under these circumstances this case cannot be made a precedent, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. I think this is such a case as has never before occurred in the history of the country; nor is it likely I hope ever to occur again. This gentleman came to his death from overwork in this House and in his home while preparing himself for the discharge of his duties here, directly under our own eyes; and he was taken from here to the insane asylum. He has left his wife penniless, and I think it is the smallest matter in the world that the United States shall contribute something as a mark of distinction due under the circumstances of his death, on account of the way in which he discharged his public duties, an honest sense of duty being one of the most prominent features of his character, so far as I had an opportunity of observing them. I do not think, sir, that our action in this case should be governed by any general law. It should be made an exception to all general laws and all general rules upon this subject.

I hope, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] will prevail, so that the widow of this man who was stricken down here almost right under our eyes may receive his salary to the end of the term for which he was elected.

The question being taken on Mr. WOODFORD'S amendment, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For postage-stamps for the offices of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, and the Secretary of the Senate, $100 each, and for the Postmaster of the House, $50; $350.

Mr. GARFIELD. There should be $250 appropriated for postage to the Sergeant-at-Arms. He has a large amount of correspondence in transacting his accounts, and this appropriation is necessary to reimburse him for his expenditures in that way. I offer the following amendment:

Add to the paragraph the following:

And for amount already expended by the Sergeant-at-Arms for postage the sum of $250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Postmaster-General to pay for twenty thousand copies quarterly of the Official Postal Guide, to be compiled and published under contract not to extend more than five years, to be made with parties doing said work at the lowest rate, $20,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment:

In line 227 strike out "$20,000" and insert the words "not exceeding $30,000."

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay W. T. Clark the balance due him for payments made on account of the purchase and repair of furniture for the post-office in the United States custom-house at Galveston, Texas, during the fiscal years ending the 30th day of June, 1872 and 1873, $1,573.58, or so much thereof as may be found due him by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

Mr. WOOD. I move to strike out that paragraph, and I make the motion for the purpose of getting some explanation from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations with reference to this extraordinary appropriation. This gentleman, W. T. Clark, was lately postmaster at Galveston, Texas. He is reported to be a defaulter. We have no reason to believe that he has yet been able to settle his accounts. At any rate, whether he has done so or not, a postmaster has no right to create an obligation which the Government is bound to pay. He cannot purchase furniture for his office and then have an appropriation to pay for it inserted in a regular appropriation bill, unless it goes through the regular course in the proper Department of the Government. Now, I want to know from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, as I find no reference to this appropriation in the report presented with this bill, whether the Postmaster-General recommends this appropriation, whether there are any documents by which it can be sustained, whether there is any precedent for an appropriation like this being put into an appropriation bill to pay obligations incurred by a postmaster who is in default to the Government?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 3601) to admit free of duty articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 750) to compel the performance of certain duties by clerks of courts of the United States; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then resumed its session.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask my colleague on the committee from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] to answer the question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. TYNER. Mr. Chairman, when the proposition was made in the Committee on Appropriations to provide this appropriation for the benefit of Clark, late postmaster at Galveston, I went to the Post-Office Department, and to the Auditor of the Treasury for that Department, to inquire into the condition of his accounts. I was there informed that the accounts of Clark had been fully settled, that so far as his accounts as postmaster were concerned they did not show the balance of a single dollar due to the Government of the United States.

This appropriation is intended to cover certain expenses that were incurred in the post-office at Galveston for furnishing the building in which the office was kept, which is a Government building, and I believe the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended the payment of this amount.

Mr. WOOD. Where is the document?

Mr. TYNER. I would say to the gentleman that the accounts are those that can be settled solely by the Treasury Department, and do not enter at all into the accounts of the Post-Office Department. So far as the Post-Office Department is concerned, I am informed not only at that Department, but by the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, that there is no balance against Mr. Clark.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment I have here a letter which I desire him to have read as a part of his remarks.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to say that it is generally understood, and I believe that it cannot be disputed, that this man Clark never intends to return to Galveston, so that if any persons there have furnished the Government with furniture for this office, he is not the proper person to pay it to for them to get the money. I hope therefore that the gentleman will, at least, consent to an alteration of this paragraph so as to provide that the Government shall pay the parties who are entitled to the money.

Mr. TYNER. In answer to that I will say that I do not know about the intentions of Mr. Clark. He may intend to return to Galveston or he may not. I never talked with him on the subject. I have no objection to the appropriation being properly guarded.

Mr. SPEER. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York as follows:

Strike out the paragraph in the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

To enable the Postmaster-General to pay the balance due on account of the purchase and repair of furniture for the post-office in the United States custom-house at Galveston, Texas, during the fiscal years ending the 30th day of June, 1872 and 1873, $1,573.58, or so much thereof as may be found due by the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid until vouchers properly receipted from the parties who actually furnished the goods shall be filed with the said Auditor: And provided further, That no part thereof shall be paid to W. T. Clark until the final adjustment of his accounts with the Post-Office Department.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to my colleague that the latter part of that amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. SPEER. Yes, it is; he may have the vouchers. I think if the committee have listened carefully to the reading of the amendment they will agree that it is a very proper amendment. It has been charged in the newspapers that this man Clark is a defaulter to the Government. Whether that charge is true or not I do not pretend to say; but it is further charged, and I believe that charge to be true, that he has left Galveston and does not intend to return there again.

He claims to have appropriated a certain amount of money in furnishing the post-office building at Galveston. I believe him to be at this time an irresponsible man. Hence my amendment provides, not that the articles which he furnished should not be paid for, but that the parties from whom he bought them shall be paid for them. If this man, W. T. Clark, has actually paid the bills for the articles, then my amendment provides that he shall be paid upon the final settlement of his accounts with the Post-Office Department.

I am not here to speak for the Postmaster-General, but I have been informed this day by him that the accounts of Mr. Clark are not yet closed at the Post-Office Department. Therefore if this amount shall be paid to him now, and if he were to produce to the Post-Office Department the original receipts of the parties from whom he bought this furniture, and get the money from the Government, it might hereafter turn out upon the settlement of his accounts that he was indebted to the Government more than the amount here appropriated.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The gentleman has no right to rise here and say that this gentleman is indebted to the United States.

Mr. SPEER. I did not say that he was; I said it might turn out so on the final settlement of his accounts.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The gentleman might say that in regard to any claim before Congress. We have here the word of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] who has had charge of the post-office appropriation bill, and who himself went to the Treasury Department to ascertain the facts. He states that the Postmaster-General told him, and I say that he told him in my presence, that Mr. Clark did not owe the Department a single farthing. Now, I do not see what right, when here is an honest claim recommended by the Department, the gentleman has to get up here and say that it is stated in the newspapers that this gentleman is a defaulter, and then spread upon the record an insult to the claimant by saying that this amount shall not be paid him until his accounts are settled by the Department. Here is a claim covering many items, some thirty or forty of them—many of them quite small. They have all been paid by Mr. Clark, but this amendment would require him to go back and obtain receipts from the parties from whom he bought them.

Mr. SPEER. If they have been paid my amendment will not hurt him.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury upon this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., May 18, 1874.

SIR: General W. T. Clark, the postmaster at Galveston, Texas, incurred without authority from this Department an expenditure of $2,585.52 in the year 1872, in the purchase and repair of furniture, &c., for the post-office under his charge, and when bills were presented to this office they were disallowed, because the expenditure had not been previously authorized by the Department and for the further reason that the amounts paid by the postmaster were exorbitant. As, however, it appeared from the reports of the custodian that the expenditures were necessary for the proper transaction of the work under the charge of the postmaster, a special agent of the Department was instructed to inspect the work and review the bills therefor, making a report to this office. In the report made by the special agent he valued the work at $1,738.60, but his estimate therefor not being in detail, and there being no appropriation from which the amount could be properly paid at the date of the same, payment was suspended. Subsequently the superintendent of repairs employed by the Department to repair and remodel the building was instructed to investigate the matter and report to this Department. His report nearly coincided with that of the special agent, he valuing the work at the sum of $1,873.58, which report was accepted by the Department, but as the expenditure was incurred in the fiscal year of 1872-'73, and the appropriation to which the work was properly chargeable—"furniture and repairs of furniture for public buildings"—being exhausted, the entire amount could not be paid. The postmaster has presented with his account for the work receipted bills from the parties to whom the payments were made, and one of said vouchers was paid, namely, one in favor of J. Kerslake, amounting to $454, as presented by the postmaster by the sum of $300, for which amount the public creditor granted a receipt in full for all the material and labor supplied by him, that being the amount recommended by the special agent and the superintendent of repairs. The balance now remaining due under the superintendent's report is $1,573.58, for which amount a special appropriation should be made in order to properly pay the same; and I have the honor to request that an appropriation of said amount, or so much thereof as may be found due by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, may be made during the present session of Congress for the relief of said postmaster.

Inclosed please find a statement of the original bills, with the amounts allowed by the special agent and superintendent of repairs referred to above.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I submit that we might just as well put upon a general appropriation bill a proviso that before the gentleman is paid his salary he shall be required to bring a receipt from the tailor in town from whom he bought his coat, or from his landlady that he has paid his board bill. That would be just as appropriate as it is to put his amendment upon this provision. This item was sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, he has indorsed it as correct, having sent two special messengers there to examine the account.

Mr. SPEER. I saw the Postmaster-General within the last half-hour, and he suggested the last proviso to the amendment which I have offered. The Secretary of the Treasury says that these goods were purchased for the use of the post-office, but he does not pretend to certify that the accounts of the postmaster with the Post-Office Department have been settled. What motive can the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] have for rising here and attempting to defeat an amendment which has for its purpose and object only the protection of the interests of the Government? Does he stand here for the purpose of securing to this man, Clark, what is not due him, before his account with the Government is settled, compelling the Government to pay him, when perhaps at this very hour he may be in debt to the Government? My amendment is in the line of honesty and justice to the Government, and not in the line of favoritism to a man who has not been a faithful public officer.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The gentleman is mistaken in his insinuation. I simply know this gentleman. I throw back the insinuation of the gentleman; it is unfounded, and he has no right to make it. It is unfounded and ungenerous.

Mr. SPEER. It is justified by the gentleman's position.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. SPEER. Coming here as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, whose duty it should be to protect the Government, the gentleman pleads the cause of a man who stands in a most doubtful attitude before the country as a public officer. I make no insinuation, but leave the gentleman where he places himself.

Mr. TYNER. I move pro forma to amend by striking out $73.58. I make this motion for the purpose merely of submitting a brief statement. The statement I made a few minutes since in regard to this matter corresponded precisely with the information I had obtained at the Post-Office Department, namely, that the accounts of the postmaster at Galveston, so far as settled, did not show a balance due from him to the Government. But since this matter has come up in the House I, too, have had a conversation with the Postmaster-General, in which he has stated that recent developments indicate that when the account shall be finally settled there may be and probably will be a balance against this man Clark. Now, I do not want to be regarded as the champion of Mr. Clark on this floor, nor would I have appeared in this debate at all but for the fact that when the matter was brought before the Committee on Appropriations I objected to providing for this payment until information could be obtained from the Post-Office Department. After I had made inquiries and had made my report to the committee, they agreed to embody this appropriation in the pending bill. But after the statement of the Postmaster-General my judgment, looking over the whole ground, is that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] ought to be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FARWELL. I move to amend by inserting after the amendment just adopted the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the appropriation already made the duly audited bills of Thomas H. Robb and Richard H. Savage, late United States commissioners upon the Mexican boundary, for balances due to them, the sum paid not to exceed $943.50 to each of said late commissioners.

I desire only to say that the Committee on Appropriations understand this amendment and do not object to it.

Mr. BECK. I rise to oppose the amendment. I want to know whether or not it is recommended by the Committee on Appropriations or how it comes here?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is not recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BECK. Is there any law by which this appropriation is authorized? I hope it will not be adopted unless there is some recommendation from some committee, or unless we have some satisfactory information in regard to it. I would like to know how these balances arose and where they came from.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the gentleman will permit me, I will tell him. The Committee on Appropriations did not put this item in the bill for this reason: The gentlemen named here were Texas boundary commissioners; they were paid at certain rates per day fixed by law. At a certain time the appropriation for one year ran out, and they came home here to Washington. Soon afterward a new appropriation was passed by Congress, and they went back to Texas and set to work again. They made claim (and that is what this item covers) for certain days' time and certain expenses of office rent during the interval when they were here between the two appropriations. The Secretary of State, in whose Department the matter came, declined to allow these payments. There was an issue between him and the commissioners. His books show that according to his manner of keeping the account the commissioners have received pay for all the time that he says they were employed. They, on the other hand, claim that during the days intervening between the two appropriations they were at work preparing their report, were obliged to hire an office, and incurred some other incidental expenses. That is the point involved; and it is one of conflict between the commissioners and the State Department.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. How old is this claim?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It arose only the year before last. The Committee on Appropriations in providing for the expenses of the different Departments of the Government did not feel authorized so to act as to antagonize the State Department's method of book-keeping in the administration of a certain fund. We had provided the appropriation; it had passed into the hands of the Secretary of State, and the committee, I repeat, did not feel authorized on its own responsibility to embody in the bill a clause which should interfere with the Secretary of State in the administration of that fund. This is the reason the appropriation was not inserted in the bill.

Mr. BECK. Was not this subject up two or three years ago?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. No, sir.

Mr. BECK. How old is the claim?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Gentlemen will remember that the Texan commission first started in the season of 1872, and closed its labors about September, 1873. I think that this claim covers the last days of 1872. It has never been before Congress heretofore.

Mr. BECK. I had an impression that it had been rejected heretofore.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We have had before us, of course, the appropriations for the Texan commission, and have had discussion upon those appropriations. But I do not remember that this appropriation has ever been up before.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, is not this amendment liable to the point of order that it proposes to make appropriation for a claim not provided for by law?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to the opinion that after the amendment has been debated on both sides the point of order is made too late.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to strike out the last word. It is proposed now to disregard the books of the State Department, and without any evidence at all except the simple statement of these commissioners to pay their claims. I think that ought not to be done. I do not believe private claims simply on the statements of the claimants themselves, without any evidence at all laid before the House. should be paid in opposition to the books of the State Department, and especially when it comes in an appropriation bill of this sort where it is not legitimate business. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FARWELL'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCCRARY. I move to insert the following:

That the proper accounting officer shall allow and pay to Eunice Barcus whatever sum may be found to have been due to her step-son, Henry Barcus, as bounty or arrears of pay as a private of Company K, Eighth Regiment Iowa Veteran Volunteers, at the time of his death, and in accordance with his last will and testament, and the sum required for this purpose is hereby appropriated.

Mr. STORM. I make the point of order on that amendment that it provides for an appropriation not required to be made by law.

Mr. MCCRARY. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his point of order for a moment.

Mr. STORM. I will withhold the point of order until the gentleman makes his statement.

Mr. MCCRARY. This is the case of a soldier who died in the service, having made a will giving to his step-mother the amount due to him as arrears of pay and bounty. He left no heirs whatever. He had been raised by his step-mother and had no other person he desired to leave his pay to. Under the statute the Department does not recognize the will, and will not pay the arrears of pay and bounty to this step-mother unless authorized so to do by Congress. That is the whole case, and I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. STORM. There are two objections to it. In the first place, there is no heirs now entitled to these arrears of pay and bounty. That is one objection. In the next place, this is a bad place, in an appropriation bill, to come in with a provision like this to pay bounty in the case of a single soldier.

This, like all other similar cases, should come in in a general bill and not be inserted in an appropriation bill. There are thousands of cases of soldiers who are entitled to bounty, but they should all come in together, and not one favored at the expense of others.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MCCRARY. I hope the Chair will reconsider his decision. The amount to pay this bounty and arrears of pay is already provided for by law. It is due under the laws of the land, and an appropriation has been made for it. This is only a provision directing its payment according to the last will and testament of this soldier.

Mr. STORM. Who would get this under the law?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the law now provide this money shall be paid in accordance with the proposed amendment?

Mr. MCCRARY. If it is not paid under the last will and testament of this soldier it cannot be paid at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair inquires of the gentleman from Iowa whether he can suggest any law which requires the payment of money as provided for in this amendment.

Mr. MCCRARY. My friend from Pennsylvania, I am sorry to say, is not willing to listen to reason or humanity.

Mr. STORM. There is no reason in the gentleman's argument, and I wish to say to him that it is only fair all these soldiers shall stand on the same footing, and not one favored at the expense of another.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment on my own individual motion and not as coming from the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

That there shall be paid to Major-General O. O. Howard, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $7,000, to reimburse him for the expense he incurred in defending his official conduct as Commissioner of Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. SPEER. I make the point of order that this is an appropriation of money not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio state there is any law authorizing this appropriation of money?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am not certain whether there is any law for that or not. I call the attention of the Chair, however, to the fact that it proposes an appropriation of money to enable an officer of the Government to reimburse himself for defending his official conduct. I am not clear in my mind that is not a proper appropriation for carrying on the official functions of Government. I leave it to the wiser judgment of the chairman.

Mr. SPEER. Does the gentleman know of any other alleged criminal whose expenses were asked to be paid by the Government?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will suggest that during the war we did pass a law which I believe is now upon our statute-books, to indemnify officers of the Army for prosecutions instituted against them.

Mr. SPEER. This was not a prosecution brought against General Howard for anything he did as a soldier.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think this will come under that law.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will direct attention to the particular law to which he refers the Chair will give his decision on it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws that that provision is still contained in the revised laws, and this amendment therefore which I have moved is plainly within the law of the United States under which officers thus prosecuted are indemnified for their expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the amendment at the time the gentleman from Ohio will call his attention to the law under which he holds it is in order.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let the right of the gentleman from Ohio to offer the amendment be reserved until he can direct the attention of the Chair to the law he has referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will reserve his decision till then.

Mr. GARFIELD. If there be no objection, I desire to make this general statement. This subject was not before the Committee on Appropriations. But I desire, in asking the attention of the Committee of the Whole and of all gentlemen who hear me on this proposition, to appeal to that Anglo-Saxon sense of fair play that I believe exists in the breast of every man without regard to party affiliations. Here is an officer who has undergone a series of most searching examinations into his official conduct. For years he has had a most difficult duty, with the largest responsibility thrown upon him, the largest discretion being intrusted to him, and after all the work has been done and all the examinations into his official conduct have been made, the highest military court on this continent, after long and patient investigation, have reached the unanimous conclusion that his official career in all matters investigated by the court has been pure and worthy in every respect. That, as I understand, was the unanimous decision of the court.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman say that it was the "unanimous" judgment of the court?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do say it, and I have the highest official authority for saying it.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Did he ever propose any appropriation to reimburse President Johnson for his expenditures in defending himself when impeached for the faithful discharge of his duties?

Mr. GARFIELD. General Howard has passed through the fiery ordeal of a public trial, and has been reduced almost to penury by the expenses of defending himself upon that trial. He has been compelled, in the proper defense of his own cause, to use up almost his entire fortune. Under such circumstances it seems to me to be a matter of fair and simple justice that the United States should say that the expenditure thus made shall be a part of its own expenditure, that the defense of the official character of its own servant shall be at the expense of the Government in whose service his work was done. And in this connection I call attention to a clause in the bill we have just passed for payment of the necessary expenses incurred in defending suits against the Secretary of the Treasury or his agents for the seizure of captured and abandoned property, &c.

Mr. ARCHER. That is under a special act.

Mr. GARFIELD. It may be under a special act, but I would simply say that there is a strict analogy between the two cases.

Mr. SPEER. I shall repeat the question which I addressed a moment ago to the gentleman from Ohio. Did he ever propose to pay the expenses of President Johnson when his party attempted to impeach him, and when the judgment, I believe, of the whole civilized world was that he was innocent?

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe he was not acquitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill, and the right of the gentleman from Ohio to offer his amendment will meanwhile be reserved until he shall cite the law to which he has referred.

Mr. BECK. When that amendment comes up I propose to offer as an amendment to it what I send to the desk. I offer it in that same line of Anglo-Saxon fair play of which the gentleman has spoken.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment will be reserved until the amendment is considered.

The Clerk read as follows:

That for printing the preparatory circulars, and for printing and binding at the Government Printing Office the report on life-insurance statistics made, under authority of the eighth international statistical congress, by William Barnes, in accordance with plan of publication adopted at said congress, under the direction of the Secretary of State, any unexpended balance of an appropriation for the above purpose, made in the act of March 3, 1873, is hereby continued and rendered available.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offer the following amendment:

At the end of line 250 add the following:

To enable the President of the United States to perfect and put in force such rules regulating the civil service as may from time to time be adopted by him, with authority to allow such compensation for special services under the act of 1871, to persons already in the service of the Government, as he may deem proper, $25,000; which sum shall include any balance of appropriation for the same object of any previous fiscal years remaining unexpended at the close of the current fiscal year.

I ask consent to have a passage read from the President's message.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Let me ask my colleague to reserve his amendment for the present and offer it at some future point in the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have examined the bill thoroughly and do not see any place where it would better come in. It would not come in among light-houses or anything of that kind. I have waited until we reached the end of the miscellaneous items. I have sent all over the Capitol for my colleague on the committee, who is absent from the Hall, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER;] I think he will be here before my amendment is disposed of.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Some members of the Committee on Appropriations who have given attention to this subject are not present just now. I ask my colleague to allow his amendment to be pending. When they are here he can again offer it for discussion.

Mr. BECK. I make the point of order on the amendment that a specific appropriation was made for a specific purpose in connection with the civil-service commission, and that this is creating new powers not granted by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] point out what new powers are created by this amendment which are not granted by law?

Mr. BECK. As I understand it, provision is made for the payment of new commissioners, such as the President may see fit to employ. I think the civil-service act limits the amount to a certain sum to be paid for a certain number of persons.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be again read.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. So much of this amendment as refers to unexpended balances may or may not be a change of existing laws. The Chair is not able to state.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] in accordance with the suggestion of his colleague, will allow his amendment to be reserved as pending for the present.

Mr. KELLOGG. Before that is done I ask that a passage from the President's message be read, and also a section of the law.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman from Connecticut to point out what portion of unexpended balances will be affected by this amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the point of order is insisted on I shall strike out that part of the amendment relating to the unexpended balances. There is now some $10,000 of the appropriation of $25,000 last year unexpended, and I made the amendment cover only $25,000 including that amount. I ask for the reading of the President's message, and also of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] insist on so much of the point of order as relates to the unexpended balances?

Mr. KELLOGG. If gentlemen insist upon it, I am willing that this matter shall lie over.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut will suspend his remarks. Does the gentleman from Kentucky insist on so much of his point of order as relates to the unexpended balances?

Mr. BECK. I do; but I have not yet been able to get the statute to see what the law is. I understand, however, that the gentleman from Connecticut proposes to let the amendment lie over.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut insist on the consideration of his amendment now?

Mr. KELLOGG. I should prefer that it shall be considered now.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a simple question, and the gentleman must answer yea or nay.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will consent, on the appeal of my colleague [Mr. STARKWEATHER] and of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that it shall be considered as pending here at this point in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amendment being considered as pending?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Connecticut must take his election, either to withdraw the amendment or to press it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope there will be no objection to its being considered as pending at this point in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut must respond to the Chair.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask consent that the message of the President be read.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Then is there any objection to the amendment being considered as pending and the committee's proceeding with the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Connecticut must either press his amendment or withdraw it.

Several MEMBERS. Withdraw it.

Several other MEMBERS. O, no; press it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I shall not withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the opinion of the Chair that so much of the amendment as refers to unexpended balances is in conflict with existing law, and is therefore out of order.

Mr. KELLOGG. I modify my amendment by striking out that part of it.

The amendment, as modified, was read, as follows:

To enable the President of the United States to perfect and put in force such rules regulating the civil service as may from time to time be adopted by him, with authority to allow such compensation for special service under the act of 1871 to persons already in the service of the Government as he may deem proper, $25,000.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask the gentleman from Connecticut to allow me to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will at the proper time.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let it be read now. I do not think the gentleman will have any objection to it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, let it be read then.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. LAWRENCE, as follows:

Add to the proposed amendment the following:
And it shall be the duty of the civil-service commission to report to the President, to be transmitted to Congress at its next session, a bill or plan for the reorganization of all the Departments of the Government so as to equalize salaries, and as far as practicable to reduce the expenses, and increase the efficiency thereof.

Mr. KELLOGG. I object to that amendment. That work has already been done in part. Now, I ask that section 9 of the law be read, the time taken in its reading not to come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to understand the gentleman from Connecticut in respect to his time?

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask that what I send up be read, not to come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Under what rule?

Mr. KELLOGG. By unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BARBER. I object.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that I withdraw my objection, now that the gentleman has withdrawn that part of the amendment in relation to unexpended balances, because I believe the amendment is now in accordance with the law.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. With the withdrawal of the objection of the gentleman from Kentucky, I want to know the status of the amendment. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the present condition of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers the amendment to the bill which has been read at the Clerk's desk. The Clerk will read it again if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. O, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is entitled to five minutes to speak in favor of the amendment, and he will proceed.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no time to state in detail what has been the action during the past year of the civil-service reform commission. I can only say this at the outset, that I beg my friends here, whether they agree with me in this matter of civil-service reform or not, to give me their attention for the few minutes allowed me under the rule.

I say this: that notwithstanding all that has been said in the newspapers and on this floor in derision of this attempt at reform, no man can read the report of the civil-service commission, showing what they have done during the last year, if careful and unprejudiced attention is given to it, without being satisfied that much good has already been accomplished. I admit that their work was crude and unsatisfactory when they first started; that many of the questions which they propounded to applicants were useless, perhaps I might say they were worse than useless in some cases. But that was owing to a great extent, perhaps, to the fact that it was an untried experiment, and time was needed to correct the errors and imperfections of a new system in the matter of appointments. I believe the President and the commissioners appointed by him have tried in good faith to improve upon the old system of appointments. In the early part of it, at the head of the commission, we had a man, Mr. George William Curtis, of New York, a polished gentleman and scholar, who is too much of a poet perhaps and altogether too fine a writer to be a very practical man in this business. He looked for perfection in the outset of the scheme, and became disgusted perhaps because he could not bring the system to perfection at once. It is possibly true that during the first part of this reform there were some questions used in the examination of candidates that naturally brought upon it the derision to some extent of the press and of the country. But if gentlemen have taken the pains to read the report of last year, they will have found that it has been during that time a most laborious commission. A very excellent man, Mr. D. B. Eaton, of New York, is at the head of the commission, honestly and faithfully striving as I believe to make our civil service better than it is. In that he has my hearty sympathy; and I say that in anything which he and his associates can do to elevate and improve the civil service of the country they ought to receive support from us without distinction of party. This civil-service commission, although it may not have accomplished all that has been hoped from it by its friends, has done much already to improve the service. The call for a reform in the civil service was an expression of the aspiration on the part of the American people for something higher and better in this matter than we have heretofore had in this country.

Now, so far as the claim which is often made here, that members of Congress should have the settlement of all this matter of offices without regard to these or any other examinations as to character and fitness for office, I say for myself that the worst curse which as members of the House we can have here is the disposition of patronage, which comes to us under the old system. For one, I almost shudder when I hear of a proposed change in a post-office in my district. I always hope that all the officers in my district will live to the end of my term. I would rather, ten times over, never hear of the resignation or removal of an officer in my district than be obliged to select a successor from among my friends. I am just so good-natured as this, that I would prefer to help all my friends who desire a place, if I had the power. Gentlemen must know that one can never be selected for an office worth having without disappointing ten or a dozen others, and making more enemies than friends whenever you are obliged to recommend an appointment. I do not shrink from the responsibility when it is placed upon me by request of a Cabinet officer or otherwise; but I have no desire to assume any more of this sort of responsibility than I am obliged to do under the present system. The less place-hunting we have to do the better it is for us as lawmakers.

The framers of our Constitution placed the appointing power in the hands of the Executive, excepting some classes of inferior officers, subject to the confirmation of the Senate; and it was not designed that this branch of the legislative department of the Government should select the officers under the Executive; and the less we have to do with it the better it is for ourselves and our constituents, for we shall thus have more time for the discharge of our legislative duties, and avoid the vexations that will come to us if obliged to make these selections.

Now in regard to the reform inaugurated under the present system, we have the almost unanimous concurrence of the members of the Cabinet and of the heads of the leading Bureaus in the Departments of the Government that it has produced a great deal of good so far in bringing more intelligent men and a better class of men into the civil service of the Government. I admit that still further improvement is needful. But what I look upon in this matter of examinations as chiefly of importance, is that you secure competent men to enter the civil service in the first place. When you come to promotions, I admit that a higher ratio or standard should be given to men who have filled their offices and performed their duties well.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I rise to oppose the amendment, and yield my time to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. KELLOGG. I say that if you will look into this report, you will find that there is almost a unanimous concurrence on the part of Cabinet officers and heads of Bureaus that there has been a great deal of good already accomplished. When you come to the matter of examination for promotion, then I say that efficiency and good conduct should stand much higher than a mere proficiency in literary attainments, or an examination by questions and answers. And that is the tendency of the system now being adopted. More weight is to be given to good conduct, efficiency in the service, and an aptness for the duties of the service, when you come to the matter of promotions in the civil service. I would give much more weight to the fact that a man having been tried had proved himself an efficient, faithful clerk, on a question of promotion, than I would to the mere correctness of his answers on an examination. But these examinations have been made of more practical character than they were at the outset, and will be improved still more if you allow the work to be continued. I have no time to read from the report the testimony of members of the Cabinet and of heads of Bureaus to show that a good work is being accomplished, but I will give a few extracts from the report:

The First Assistant Postmaster-General reports, "That, in my opinion, the application of these rules, judged in the light of their collective and general result, has been in a marked degree beneficial to the public interests. Under the system of examinations prescribed we have, in the first place, secured more competent and reliable persons for appointment; and, secondly, greater zeal and industry in the discharge of duty and more earnest application in mastering the details of any work or position assigned, attributable, I doubt not mainly, if not entirely, to the fact that promotion was by the rules made the reward of the most faithful and capable; and, thirdly, greater concern for the service and pride in its success, due largely to the conviction that continuance in it depended not so much on what is called influence or supposed necessities of party policy as merit and efficiency. The protection afforded by the system has tended in no small degree to encourage the feeling of individual responsibility, which in its turn develops manliness and force of character."

1. The Comptroller of the Currency states that, so far as the rules apply to male clerks, "the results have been a higher and better grade of clerks than under the old system." Though there was some inconvenience from delay in procuring clerks promptly, he says, "I am satisfied that this and all other inconveniences which might be enumerated will disappear after the plan shall have been fully matured. I have no doubt that the public service will be purified * * * by the * * * continuance of the system." He favors making promotion depend on the head of the Bureau.

2. The Register of the Treasury says of the rules that, "so far as I have had an opportunity of judging of the effects, they have, in my opinion, been promotive of good results, and calculated to elevate the standard of clerical ability and efficiency." He thinks that heads of Bureaus should have greater control over promotions, and that certain duties could be performed by a class of women having less attainments than the rules demand. He hopes that experience may so perfect the rules as to "commend them to the favor and support of intelligent citizens of all parties."

3. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue says that "the application of the rules referred to, so far as this office is concerned, has been satisfactory, and in my opinion furnishes an intelligent and capable class of clerks for the public service."

4. The Second Comptroller states that "the appointees to this office under the system of competitive examinations have given entire satisfaction, and I am of opinion that, as a class, the persons who have entered the service under the civil-service rules are superior in point of ability to those obtained under the former mode of examination and appointment."

And the same or similar testimony is given in the report by most of the heads of the different Bureaus.

I hope my friends, even if some of them do not think much of the cause I am advocating, will think enough of me to give at least a little attention to what I may say upon this subject, for it is no more than fair and right to give this subject a candid attention before you strike at it. In the little time that is left me about all I can state further is the action of the committee upon this matter. In the first place, the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, by a very fair majority, voted to recommend to the Committee on Appropriations to put in this bill $25,000 for this purpose, as recommended by the President in his message referred to our committee. That was communicated to the Committee on Appropriations. I know that some of them were in favor of it, but I am very sorry to say a majority were not in favor of it and they voted it down, and for that reason it does not appear in the bill. Upon that committee rests the responsibility of rejecting the appropriation asked for in the President's message, and not upon the committee of which I happen to be chairman.

At a subsequent meeting of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER]—and I am very sorry the gentleman from Massachusetts is not here; he was here when we began, and I presume he will be here yet—made a motion to rescind that resolution, which was voted down by a tie vote. Then a sort of nondescript resolution was offered by him, saying in terms that we were in favor of no appropriation to carry on the experiment further as it has been carried on. Now, we do not any of us propose to carry it on exactly as it has been carried on. It has improved under the light of experience. Mr. Eaton, the head of the commission, is doing his utmost to perfect the rules for a more efficient service. They have organized five different districts in the country, so that the applicants shall not all be obliged to come here to Washington for examination. Every effort is being made to treat the whole country fairly in this matter of examinations and appointments. Now, when we have a law for this appropriation, a law by which we call upon the President to employ these officers; when we have adopted this principle in our platforms, it is not my idea of good faith to turn around as soon as we can and endeavor to destroy every good thing we have put in our party platforms.

Some of us seem to be trying this experiment upon nearly every good thing we had in our party platforms two years ago on both sides of the House, the return to specie payments and all our other pledges; but there is something higher than party platforms in this question. There is a settled desire and determination of the American people to make our civil service better and nobler; and I warn my friends on both sides of the House that they cannot satisfy the demands of the people by any such ill-advised action as refusing this small appropriation which the law you have enacted calls for. Make the appropriation to meet the law you have enacted while it stands upon your statute-books; or else repeal the law like men, and take the responsibility of your action home to your constituents and settle it there.

[Mr. CREAMER addressed the Committee of the Whole. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. RICE. I wish to make a motion.

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is in order.

Mr. RICE. Then I wish to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. RICE. I wish to propose that hereafter the President of the United States shall be placed under the guardianship of the gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat.

Mr. CREAMER. The gentleman is right, for he should be placed under the guardianship of somebody.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I make the point of order that it changes existing law.

Mr. WOODFORD. I move pro forma to strike out the last word.

My friend and colleague from New York apparently objects to the fitness of the Executive mainly on the ground that before the war he had only been educated to drive a team of mules.

Mr. CREAMER. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. WOODFORD. We set him at that task in the autumn of 1868 and again in 1872. He drove the mules so well that each time the driven team went home, while he went into the White House. He certainly drives well.

Now, I am perfectly aware that the question under discussion is one which does not apparently affect the sympathy or enlist the thoughtful attention of very many gentlemen in this House. The most of you have very few Federal offices in your districts. But kindly bear with me for a moment, while I attempt to speak of the practical results of that which is a very practical question, deeply affecting the party and efficiency of the administration of governmental affairs in the great cities and here where the great Departments are located.

In the custom-house at the port of New York there are more than fourteen hundred officials, deriving their appointment from the Treasury Department or directly from the Executive. In the post-office at New York there are more than seven hundred officials. In the navy-yard, at the city of Brooklyn, where I live, there are, when the yard is full, more than two thousand employés. Thus there are over two thousand in New York City, and over two thousand in Brooklyn.

For well-nigh one and a half generations this enormous mass of appointments has been largely regarded as so much capital or stock in trade for the dominant party, and has been largely used to reward political services and accomplish partisan results. This has been equally done by whichever party was in power at the time. Political leaders have sought on the one hand to serve the public, while on the other they have been careful to control the party organization. Whenever these interests have been antagonistic the public service has gone to the wall, and the party necessity has had the center of the road. This has been the result alike under both parties and all administrations.

There are in the State of New York one hundred and twenty-eight assembly districts. It is believed that shrewd politicians, whether of the democratic or republican schools, when in possession of Federal power, when in control of the patronage and the appointments of the navy-yard, the post-office, and the custom-house, can practically control the delegations from at least one-quarter of the assembly districts in the State political conventions and thus necessarily have potent voice in making the nominations of rulers of that great State.

Mr. HOSKINS. Will my friend from New York allow me to ask him a question, and that is whether, under the operation of the civil-service rule, these offices have not all been filled by the party in power precisely as they were before?

Mr. WOODFORD. I was coming to that in one moment; but will suggest in reply to my colleague that the republican has always claimed to be the party of the school-house. Our republican candidates ought therefore to have passed the examining boards and to have shown themselves competent. If they have had equal chance, I am not surprised that these offices have been filled under the new system from the party in power.

But a truce to jest and pleasant reply. I ask gentlemen to realize the effect of this condition of things upon any and all parties. The necessary and inevitable evil is more than this. The direct and logical effect of this enormous patronage is to create factions within parties and to feed factions instead of strengthening parties. Certain leaders are found to have great influence with the appointing power. These men are naturally courted and followed by those who being out of office want appointments, and by those who being in office seek to keep their places. This injures the public service by substituting faithful political labor for faithful performance of official duty. It demoralizes the manhood of the office-holder by compelling or inducing him to consult the will of his official chief instead of his own conscience, and to serve the purposes of a faction instead of the higher interests of a nation through the agency of a party. This is the old idea of "To the victors belong the spoils," carried out to its logical result and bearing its logical fruits.

Here in Washington, you have yourselves seen the evils of this thing. You have seen with each new administration the corridors of the Capitol, the corridors of the hotels, crowded, literally swarming with people coming from every part of the Union in order to secure appointments or employment. It has been and to-day is a burden on you, their Representatives, keeping you from your natural and proper duties and making you suitors for Executive favor and brokers in departmental appointments. It is a strain upon the very system of our government, already become severe and each year growing more severe and dangerous. Our President, when he came into power, saw the evil and sought to remedy it.

Right here let me also say that if it takes great political wisdom for the party in power to use its patronage shrewdly, it takes great courage for a party in power to reform or squarely to attempt to reform its own abuses. The President saw this evil, and in harmony with his request and of our own free motion this civil-service commission came into being.

I am not here to defend that commission for all it has done, or the Administration for all the appointments that have been made. But I am here to say this: if that commission fails, its failure will depend not only on itself and on the President, but largely on you and on me.

The President has been largely left to stand alone. The prominent politicians of each district all over the land have besought and pestered him to yield here, and yield there, to ease up on this rule, to serve this deserving candidate, and overlook that rule to oblige that influential friend. We have ourselves in many instances stood in the way and made the path of this reform very difficult alike to the President and to the heads of the several Executive Departments. We have put "civil-service reform" into platforms and convention resolutions. We have spoken of it on the hustings. Our editors have praised it in the press. Thoughtful citizens, conscious of the growing evils of partisan patronage, have approved our purpose, and been sadly disappointed at our performance. Let us acknowledge the facts and remedy our own shortcomings.
